Cotler defends Egyptian activist

Saad Ibrahim facing 'trumped-up charges'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

On Tuesday, Jan. 7, human rights advocates around the world will turn their attention to Cairo where Egypt's Cour de Cassation, an appellate court that also sits as a court of first instance, will hear evidence in a case that has become an international cause célèbre.

Pro-democracy advocate Saad Eddin Ibrahim will be in the dock, facing a host of "trumped-up charges" his Canadian lawyer says are a clumsy attempt by the Egyptian government to silence a fragile pro-democracy movement.

Mount Royal Liberal MP and human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler visited Ibrahim in Cairo recently and came away impressed with the Egyptian sociologist's "moral courage" and perseverance, even though he is in poor health and has spent much of the last 18 months years in jail.

Mideast human rights case a cause célèbre

The Jan. 7 trial will be Ibrahim's third since he was arrested in September 2000, but the first in a court in which he can expect a fair hearing based solely on the evidence, Cotler said. Earlier trials were held in the State Security Court, and on one occasion, he was convicted after the court deliberated for only 20 minutes and was sentenced to seven years hard labour. It was a decision of the Cour de Cassation that overturned his earlier convictions and ordered a new trial. He was released in early December pending the new trial.

Ibrahim, 64, is director and chair of the Board of Trustees of the Ibn Khaldun Centre for Development Studies, a Cairo-based research institute he founded in 1988. He is internationally recognized for the study of applied social sciences in Egypt and is a senior advisor to numerous international non-governmental organizations..

In June 2000, Ibrahim and 27 colleagues were arrested for training fellow Egyptians in voter registration and election monitoring. They were held 45 days without charge and the case was referred to the State Security Court after Ibrahim announced he intended to proceed with election monitoring despite his arrest.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Hnatyshyn Mourned

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress mourned the passing last month of former governor general and Tory cabinet minister Ramon Hnatyshyn for his "dedicated service to Canadian society." CJC also noted that as justice minister, Hnatyshyn "championed the legislation enabling Canada to pursue Nazi, and other, war criminals found in our country."

Doer Condemns Terror

WINNIPEG — Manitoba Premier Gary Doer condemned terrorism and anti-Semitism at the recent annual luncheon of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, saying he stands with Israel and the Jewish people. "Anti-Semitism must be fought every hour, every day, by every citizen," the New Democratic Party leader told the audience of 600. "I am horrified by the barbarism of indiscriminate terrorist attacks."

ISRAEL

Mitzna Tough Talk

JERUSALEM — The leader of Israel's Labor party attempted to shake off his dovish image last month in an appearance before a group of students. Amram Mitzna threatened harsh retaliation against the Palestinians if they continue launching terrorist attacks. "If you continue with terror, we will beat you to a pulp," Mitzna said. Mitzna is vying with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for centrist voters in the Jan. 28 general election.

Envoy's Son Dies

JERUSALEM — The son of Israel's ambassador to the United Nations died last month from a kidney infection. Ran Lancry died at 26, 13 years after his father, Yehuda, donated a kidney to him. It has been a difficult year for Yehuda Lancry: his father died of old age and his niece, Noa Shlomo, 18, was killed in a suicide bombing attack on a bus in northern Israel.

Jane Fonda Visits

JERUSALEM — Actress Jane Fonda met last month with suicide bombing victims recovering in one of Hadassah's hospitals in Jerusalem and with female MKs Yael Dayan and Naomi Chazan. Fonda's visit to Israel was sponsored by the women's group V-day, which works to stop violence against women. Fonda also visited Palestinian-controlled areas.

WORLD

Investigations Begin

VILNIUS — Murder investigations have been opened against three men who allegedly served in the collaborationist 12th Lithuanian Auxiliary Police Battalion in World War II that murdered thousands of Jews in Lithuania and Belarus from 1941 to 1943. Zenonas Garsva, Stepas Kuprys and Jouzas Mazeika were on a list of 97 suspects given to Lithuanian authorities in August 2001 by Nazi hunter Efraim Zuroff of the Simon Wiesenthal Center. Zuroff called on Lithuania to press for the extradition of Garsva and Kuprys from Columbia and Mazeika from Venezuela, where they currently reside.

New Dictionary

NEW YORK— A dictionary that translates Hebrew words into a language spoken by a group that describes itself as one of Israel's lost tribes was published recently, the Jerusalem Post reported. It contains hundreds of entries in Hebrew, English and Mizo, the language spoken by the B'nai Menashe in northeastern India. Members believe they are descended from the biblical lost tribe of Menashe. Many have immigrated to Israel in recent years after undergoing formal conversions to Judaism.

Poet Appointed

NEWARK — After being criticized for his poem hinting Jews were behind the Sept. 11 attacks, New Jersey's poet laureate Amiri Baraka was named to the same position by the Newark school district on Nov. 26. Jewish groups criticized the appointment when they learned of it late last month.

Arsonist Convicted

NEW YORK — A man has been convicted for trying to set fire to a Bronx synagogue. Mazin Assi, 23, was found guilty last month for the attempted firebombing of Synagogue Adath Israel on Yom Kippur in October 2000. He faces up to 22 years in jail when he is sentenced Jan. 22. He and a second man, Mohammed Alfaqih, 21, both of Yonkers, N.Y., were tried under state hate crimes laws. A second jury is deliberating Alfaqih's case.

Britain Backs Off Ambassador's Remark

LONDON — The British government has distanced itself from a remark last month by the British ambassador to Israel that seemed to justify terrorism under certain circumstances.

"Terrorism defined as attacks on innocent civilians is always absolutely wrong," a British Foreign Office spokesperson told the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

Ambassador Sherard Cowper-Coles told participants at a conference last month in Berlin that terrorism in the framework of a national struggle is not necessarily wrong.

"We can all think of times in history when the use of terrorism has been justified," he said at the conference on Israeli-European relations, the Jerusalem Post reported.

He said Jewish groups in Mandatory Palestine, such as the Stern Gang, had carried out acts of terrorism while fighting for the creation of Israel.

Cowper-Coles later expressed regret for his comments, the Post reported.

Concordia Hillel sues student union for $100,000

Alleged rights violations cited

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Concordia Hillel is suing the Concordia Student Union (CSU) for $100,000 in punitive damages, claiming the CSU has acted illegally and violated Jewish students' constitutional freedoms by withholding Hillel's funding and denouncing it without just cause.

The CSU placed the sanctions on Hillel because it accused Hillel of distributing flyers publicizing Mahal, a program that allows young Diaspora Jews to serve in the Israeli Defence Forces.

In its suit, Hillel alleges that the CSU is deliberately suppressing support of Israel and fostering an atmosphere on campus that is making Jewish students "apprehensive, fearful and threatened."

The suit, filed by lawyer Michael Bergman, also asks that a series of resolutions passed by the CSU last month condemning Hillel be declared illegal and that Hillel be "reinstated immediately and unconditionally."

The suit alleges that the CSU has an anti-Israel agenda and has victimized Hillel because of its support for the state. In advancing its politics, the suit says the CSU has repeatedly defied its own bylaws and university regulations.

Concordia University is named as a mise-en-cause, or co-party, to the suit for "fail[ing] to take control over its campus, to assert its authority over its facilities and university life, and has been insufficiently assertive in the face of the CSU's attempt to hold the university hostage to the CSU's position and agenda."

Hillel wants Superior Court to order the university to enforce its rules regarding use of space, student rights and preserving peaceful discourse.

The suit is a strongly worded and lengthy indictment of the CSU, alleging that since 1999, its leadership has been dominated by "extremists, anarchists and anti-capitalists" who "seek to promote anarchy, oppose capitalism and discredit and delegitimize" Israel and its supporters.

The suit alleges that the CSU only promotes the views of those opposed to Israel, including those who distribute "hate literature," and that it has tried to silence those who are pro-Israel.

As a consequence, Jewish students "find themselves increasingly subject to anti-Israel and anti-Jewish propaganda and harassment, either issued by the CSU, promoted by the CSU or issued and promoted by clubs and organizations sponsored by the CSU."

The current crisis began Dec. 2 when the CSU Council of Representatives adopted a resolution that suspended Hillel's privileges to use student space for information tables or other activities and withdrew its funding from CSU, which this year amounts to $3,000. The resolution, introduced by Adam Slater, denounced Hillel for having been found with flyers for Mahal on its table.

Hillel claims the initial resolution is illegal because it was not given advance notice or a chance to give its version of the facts. In any event, Bergman reiterated that the presence of the flyer does not contravene Canadian law because no intent to recruit can be proven.

On Dec. 6, CSU president Sabine Friesinger proposed a modified resolution, subsequently adopted by the council Dec. 12, which restored Hillel's ability to use space, but continued to withhold funding until it signs a "statement of principles."

This document is similar to the one drawn up by the university before it lifted the moratorium on Middle East-related events. It gives a promise of mutual respect between students of opposing views on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Impending changes

From the editor's desk

Occasionally in January, we integrate minor editorial changes into The CJN as part of our ongoing effort to fine-tune, improve and refresh the paper.

This year is no exception. Readers will soon notice two very important changes. One of them marks the end of an era.

Miriam Herman, our elegant, soft-spoken, sage, super-organized, beloved compiler of the What's New column has retired from The CJN. After nearly three decades of chronicling the myriad, diverse, weekly activities of the organized Jewish community of Toronto, Miriam has decided to set more time aside for family and for more personal pursuits.

Without a doubt, Miriam's column is the most popular spot in The CJN, and for good reason. It is the finely crafted, detailed distillate of the weekly life of a 200,000-strong community.

With the adroit administrative skill of the clerk of the Privy Council, Miriam would assemble, organize and collate the massive amounts of paper, telephone and e-mail announcements sent to her each week. Then, with the artistic skill of Rodin, she would sculpt and pare down the unshaped mountain of announcements into the readable two-page artform of key information that most readers usually turned to first when they picked up The CJN.

Her colleagues at the paper will sorely miss her. We, as well as her readers, owe her a great debt. A more comprehensive tribute and expression of thanks to Miriam will appear in the next few weeks.

Miriam passes her pen to Rebecca Nadler, who will begin Jan. 16 to tell readers what's new in the community.

The second change does not mark the end of an era, but it is significant nevertheless. It relates to the op-ed column by Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut. His column will appear monthly rather than weekly.

Deadlines are immoveable and cruel. They create constant, in-the-pit-of-one's-stomach pressure. We have therefore decided to lessen the pressure on the rabbi. For, even after his 90th birthday, which he recently celebrated, the demands on Rabbi Plaut's time have not abated. He deserves, therefore, finally, the opportunity to face a little less pressure from The CJN.

Following Rabbi Plaut in a weekly rotation will be Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Montreal, Dr. Lawrence Hart of Hamilton, and Concordia University professor Norma Baumel Joseph. We are certain they will be a great addition to the paper, bringing new and unique voices to the diverse harmony that comprises The CJN.

* * *

Some seven years ago in this space, I reflected upon the mission of The Canadian Jewish News in the context of the unique challenges that confront the North American Anglo-Jewish press.

In those intervening seven years, the basic purpose, the mission, of this newspaper, has not changed. Nor will it change, I hazard to say, in 70 or even in 170 years. That mission proclaims, as propounded by its board of directors, that The CJN is "devoted to serv[ing] the Jewish people in Canada, in Israel and in all its habitations."

It is the starting point, the reference point, the end point, indeed, the total enveloping point of it all, as far as The CJN is concerned.

How we fulfil our mission, how we "serve the Jewish people," is the ocean on which we sail each week, a vast body of ceaseless currents and swells that ebb and surge according to the countless daily tributaries of Jewish life from around the world that flow into it.

The ship, of course, by which we navigate that mission, is the core activity of our newspaper, namely, to provide our readers with reliable and instructive information, commentary and opinion.

But if our mission has not changed in the intervening seven years, a great deal of the Jewish context has. In that period of time, the Jewish people have absorbed four cataclysmic traumas:

- the assassination of the prime minister of Israel by a fellow Jew;
- the rejection by the current generation of Palestinian leaders of a negotiated peace with Israel;
- the launch of a Palestinian-led, pan-Islamist, "low-grade" war of violence and terrorism against Israelis; and
- the resulting re-emergence, especially in Europe, of ugly, age-old expressions of anti-Semitism against Israelis and Jews.

For the generation of Jews born after 1948, it seems, everything has changed. We were imbued with a sense of optimism that despite the wars Israel had fought and despite the bitter enmities between contending states and contending peoples, a peaceful and fair accommodation among the parties and especially between the Palestinians and the Israelis was inevitable. Peace made sense. Peace was the highest manifestation of concern by the leaders for their respective peoples. Peace was the political, social and economic means by which the sanctity of life was embodied and enshrined into everyday life. Peace should be the norm.

Now, after the events of the past 27 months and the ominous possibility of more conflict on the troubled horizon, our sense of optimism has been deeply bruised. For the time being at least, to reach for it, to touch it even tenderly, is to evoke a feeling of terrible pain.

But to reach for it, we constantly must try. That too is part of our mission.

—MBD

Evangelical Christian spawns support for Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For five years, Randall Smith lived in the last apartment in Gilo, a four-storey villa at the outskirts of Jerusalem that featured a tremendous view of Bethlehem and Beit Jalla. But then the bullets started flying.

The limestone outer walls stopped most of the shots and the sandbags installed by the Israeli military on his balcony stopped many more. Even when the sandbags became shredded by the impact of many bullets, Smith would not leave.

Late one night, as he and his wife lay in bed, a random shot entered their bedroom, hit a wall and splattered fragments across the room.

It was the wall his wife had just had painted the week before, but what's more, the incident served as a reminder that their three children couldn't be safe from ricochets even in the protected courtyard where they played.

Smith decided to move – to another apartment in Gilo that was not quite on the front lines of Palestinian intifadah.

Remarkably, he had no problem selling the villa. In fact, there was a waiting list for it.

Although no longer on the front lines, Smith is still very much immersed in the conflict, even though as a U.S.-born Christian, he could pick up and leave at any time.

But Smith has made Israel his home. His businesses, as director of the Christian Travel Study Program and creator of the Wilderness Tabernacle, are there. So are his friends and his support group. His kids are fluent in Hebrew and perfectly comfortable living in Jerusalem.

But business is slow these days, and Smith was in Toronto recently as part of a three-month North American tour that will see him visit churches, Bible schools and community groups and speak to the media to discuss one of his favourite topics – replacement theology and the role of Jews and Israel in Christian thought.

An articulate, even charismatic lecturer, Smith is part of an evangelical movement that has spawned tremendous political, moral and financial support for Israel and has helped the Jewish Agency return thousands of Jews to their ancestral homeland.

Replacement theology, which dates back to the second century and holds that the church has replaced the Jews in a covenant with God, is still "part of the salad that's Christianity you get today," he said.

Smith attributes that view to a wing of early Christianity heavily influenced by Greek thought, which did not fully understand the Jewish content of Jesus' message.

Many Christians today, he said, have come to accept that God has not abandoned and does not ignore the Jewish people. "There is a revival of understanding of the Jewish role in our faith," he said. "There's an understanding among many of the role Jews should play."

Return to Israel, in-gathering of the exiles and opposition to the Palestinian attempt to undermine Israel are part of the worldview of this wing of the Christian world. "Israel finds some of its most ardent friends among conservative Christians," he said.

Several conservative Christians established the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem (ICEJ) in 1980, shortly after 13 nations withdrew their embassies after Jerusalem was declared the undivided capital of Israel. The move was intended as a show of support for Israel, and each year, one of its most popular programs, a celebration of Sukkot, the Feast of Tabernacles, brings thousands flocking to Israel in a concrete demonstration of solidarity.

Donna Holbrook, national director for ICEJ Canada, who helped organize Smith's Canadian tour, said conservative Christian supporters of Israel are not nearly as numerous in Canada as south of the border, but the group does find support in Ontario and Western Canada, particularly in Vancouver.

As part of the ICEJ's goal to bring comfort and support to Israel, it raises money to help bring Jews to Israel and for social assistance programs for olim once they are in the Holy Land.

The group counts about 2,000 supporters who receive a newsletter or donate funds.

Holbrook, who has been with the group for a year and a half, is working to expand its reach, attract new supporters and develop new programs. ICEJ supporters have attended pro-Israel rallies, they have marched against anti-Semitism, they co-sponsored a recent speaking engagement by columnist Joseph Farah, they held a prayer vigil for David Rosenzweig, they organize visits to Israel and they are hoping to join forces with the Jewish community "so we can become a unified body" and more effectively advocate for Israel.

"I think we can start to become influential," she said. "This is an enormously growing phenomenon."

As for Jewish concerns that ultimately conservative Christian groups would like to see Jews become Christian, Smith said his view is that both sides will accept the messiah when he comes. For Jews it will mark his first arrival, for Christians, his second.

Back in the world of commerce, Smith's plans suffered a major setback as a result of the intifadah. He had been banking on an influx of Christian visitors to Israel to visit the Wilderness Tabernacle he had constructed with the help of Christian investors.

In September 2000, just weeks before the onset of the intifadah, the Tabernacle was opened at Kibbutz Almag, near Jericho. Measuring 150 feet by 75 feet, the replica Tabernacle was based on the description in the Hebrew Bible. When the details of the construction were unclear, Smith turned for help to texts penned by Rashi, the medieval Jewish sage. Eleven buses showed up the first day the facility opened. Today, however, visitors are mostly local Jews and even they are few and far between. Two Merkava tanks are stationed near the Tabernacle, to prevent the roof of a nearby casino from being used by Palestinian shooters.

Smith who serves as director of the Christian Travel Study Program, also helps train guides for both the Israeli and Palestinian tourism industries.

His class at Bethlehem University is 60 per cent Muslim and 40 per cent Christian, but he sees no difference in their attitudes to Jews, which he said is marked by "ignorance."

Because holy sites are relevant to biblically-oriented tourism, "I'm teaching them for the first time what the Bible says about Jewish people."

Smith, a native of New Jersey who also lived in Florida, said his students "have a distorted view of the world" and see themselves only as victims.

He believes they experience "an emotional response to events. The event is as I feel it was and so, you get exaggeration of 'massacres'" like Jenin, he said. He also tells them that "if you start the problem, you're not the victim. But you know, they've never been challenged by that logic."

Israeli school helps new immigrants

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jason Dulberg's first job at Kfar Galim – an Israeli boarding school serving 300 students from Grades 7 to 12 – was as a madrich (counsellor, or house father) to 42 new olim from Russia. Today he is the school's director of development and public relations, travelling frequently to raise funds for the school.

"Instead of helping 42 kids, I'm trying to help 300 get ahead in life," he said in a recent interview at the Lipa Green building.

Most of the students – about 75 per cent – in the boarding school are Russian immigrants. Another 15 per cent are Ethiopian and the remainder are sabras, Dulberg said.

Many are from single-parent families and/or financially distressed households. Some have no parents in Israel with whom they can live, he added

Dulberg, a Bronx native who has lived in Israel for 17 years, lives with his wife and children in Kfar Galim, an agricultural village of 40 families five miles south of Haifa that also houses the student residence and the school, which also serves about 800 day students.

The school was established in 1953 as an agricultural school, but it now encompasses an environmental studies high school and junior high school, as well as a college for technicians and practical engineers.

In his madrich days, Dulberg was responsible for making sure his students were up in the morning, got to school, kept their rooms clean, ate their meals, and went to bed at a certain time. "But it's a lot more than that," said Dulberg. "Madrich, in Hebrew, is a guide. We're there to be able to talk to the kids and help them solve problems."

The youngsters he was responsible for came into the school not speaking much Hebrew, not wanting to be in Israel, and having minimal connection to Judaism, he said.

After graduation, not only do they serve in the Israel Defence Forces, but a large number have joined the elite forces. Girls, who have the option of not serving in the army, also decided to serve and requested reassignment so they could help other young immigrants become acclimated.

That is "one of the reasons we feel [Kfar Galim] is such a powerful, positive project," Dulberg said.

Sometimes alumni return from the army on weekend leaves – there are separate trailer homes for them – and they talk informally to current students. "They teach important things about living in Israel, about living a life, about respect and honesty," said Dulberg.

Like most Israeli institutions, Kfar Galim is feeling a financial pinch as the government diverts social service funding toward more pressing security needs because of the ongoing intifadah.

The government provides about 80 per cent of the cost of sending students to the boarding school, which runs 25,000 shekels each per year.

Among the projects Dulberg has been fundraising for are an on-site synagogue and lighting for a basketball court. Both of them are compelling to him personally, the former because he is an observant Jew (Kfar Galim is, however, a secular school) and the latter – aside from the fact that he likes playing basketball – because the court helps students to become involved in something constructive.

Now that the lights are in place, students are "out there all the time playing. If they're there at night, they're not smoking dope, drinking alcohol or doing monkey business.

"I don't want to exaggerate our importance, but I feel in some cases we're saving Jewish souls from being on the street."

New Conservative chumash gets mixed reviews

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

At an evening to inaugurate the Conservative movement's new Etz Hayim Chumash, rabbinic responses ranged from enthusiasm to disappointment.

Torah in Toronto, held Dec. 14 at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, drew more than 150 laypeople and leaders for an evening of Torah study around the new chumash. Participants attended a variety of concurrent sessions, ranging from nusach (liturgical melodies) to biomedical ethics.

Rabbi Wayne Allen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue discussed Etz Hayim's mixture of classical and modern scholarship, and its divisions between pshat (literal) and drash (homiletical) insights, and offered comparisons with Rabbi Joseph Hertz's 1936 chumash.

Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec used Etz Hayim to navigate what he considers texts that are commonly misunderstood. Speaking of God's non-gendered nature, he said, "The rabbis had this understanding 2,000 years ago. Over the centuries, we forgot it; Hertz forgot it. Now [in Etz Hayim], it's back."

Rabbi Howard Morrison of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue spoke on The People of the Book: Four Torah Commentaries, One Torah Text. Promoted as an opportunity to see Etz Hayim compared with the chumashim of other movements, it quickly evolved into a session of Conservative cheerleading and boosterism.

Rabbi Morrison compared a selection of three passages from Etz Hayim and Artscroll's Stone Edition chumash, in each case pointing to a more comprehensive commentary in Etz Hayim.

He briefly mentioned an article from New York's Jewish Week on the heyday of the Hertz chumash, when it was used across movements, offering a range of modern and classical scholarship and creating a semblance of unity.

The new chumashim, Rabbi Morrison said, mirror only their own movements' ideological currents.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl said Beth Tzedec is already using Etz Hayim in its main sanctuary. He appreciates its enhanced readability and "fidelity to the best of contemporary biblical scholarship," adding that "the fine, fine essays at the back... are, as they say, worth the price of admission."

But price is one reason Shaar Shalom Congregation won't buy Etz Hayim anytime soon. "It's far too expensive," said the synagogue's spiritual leader, Rabbi Martin Berman. Etz Hayim retails for around $125.

Instead, Shaar Shalom purchased Artscroll's Stone Edition chumashim this summer. And despite his appreciation of Etz Hayim's scholarship, Rabbi Allen said Beth Tikvah will continue using Hertz.

After waiting years for Etz Hayim, Rabbi Berman was disappointed by its drash passages, edited by Rabbi Harold Kushner. "I don't find it that fulfilling," he said. Commenting on the halachic passages in the new chumash, Rabbi Berman said though there are some "gems," most "don't say much of anything."

Like Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, Rabbi Berman mentioned a few strengths, including updated translations and use of "sensitive critical biblical studies."

Rabbi Morrison suggested that this critical approach best fits Conservative views: "Not everything came down in a thunderbolt and stayed the same forever."

Throughout the evening, the speakers talked about the development of Conservative Judaism thought through the publication of Etz Hayim. Is swordfish kosher? What about cohabitation? Can Jews donate organs? Can daughters of kohanim (priests) offer the traditional priestly blessing?

Rabbi Allen said, "Etz Hayim gives us the benefit of the past 70 years of scholarship," shedding light on these and other issues.

For Rabbi Morrison, those 70 years have opened new understandings: "Who said Torah is meant to be a history book or an encyclopedia?" Torah contains history and other elements, but "ultimately transcends it all."

BJE holds annual conference

More than 100 Toronto principals, administrators, Board of Jewish Education (BJE) personnel and spouses representing a wide variety of Jewish day and supplementary schools affiliated with the BJE recently attended the 19th annual conference of The Association of Administrators and Principals of Jewish Schools of Greater Toronto.

Held this year at the Renaissance Fallsview Hotel in Niagara Falls, Ont., the weekend meetings were co-sponsored by the BJE.

The annual conference is an opportunity to explore topics of mutual interest and to network and engage in professional discourse with colleagues from the Jewish schools in Toronto. In the spirit of pluralism that has identified this unique conference since it began in 1981, the participants represented many shades of the Jewish ideological spectrum.

> 'Schools famous for their quality'

"This weekend is living proof that the Toronto Jewish community is unique," said BJE executive director Seymour (Epi) Epstein. "Our schools are famous for their quality and the community is known for its variety, but this gathering attests to the communal unity that exists among the various partners. Unity in diversity is not a mere slogan in our community; it is reality."

The theme of the conference was Lobbying for Israel in Times of Crisis. Scholars in residence were Dr. David Goldberg, director of research and education for the Canada-Israel Committee and Prof. Harold (Hesh) Troper, historian in the department of theory and policy studies at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, University of Toronto.

Highlight of the conference included tributes honouring two retirees: Rabbi Shlomo Jacobovits and Bernard Shoub.

Rabbi Jacobovits, general studies principal at Eitz Chaim Day School from 1962-66 and 1976-2002, retired last spring after 48 years in Jewish education. Born in Berlin, Rabbi Jacobovits received his elementary and high school education in England. He began teaching Jewish studies in 1956 in Paramus, N.J., while studying at Yeshiva University where he received his BA.

One of the original founders of this annual conference, Shoub, director of school finances of the Board of Jewish Education since July 1977, will be retiring at the end of the school year. Before coming to Toronto's BJE, he taught for 15 years in Montreal, where he was born and raised.

His involvement with Jewish education began when he chaired Montreal's Association for Advancement of Jewish Education in the early 1970s, and successfully won community funding for Jewish schools.

The conference steering committee was co-chaired by Joan Schoenfeld (Downtown Jewish Community School) and Dr. Raymond Stern and Alan Steinfeld (Netivot HaTorah Day School) and included delegates from the Association of Principals in Jewish Day Schools, the Association of Jewish Day School Administrators and the Supplementary Schools Principals' Council.

Canadian Friends of Ohr Somayach gets new president

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The recently appointed president of Canadian Friends of Ohr Somayach, family physician Max Glassman, is concerned about rising assimilation and the numbers of young people looking for answers in religions other than Judaism.

"Even those who did have some Jewish education in their earlier years are often influenced by other philosophies and ideologies – especially Christian ones – and are swayed by them," Glassman said in a recent interview.

His concern led to his support of Ohr Somayach, an international educational outreach organization that began in Jerusalem as a response to young people's desire to learn more about Judaism.

Glassman and his wife, Gianna, became active with Ohr Somayach after they did extensive research into different yeshivas and outreach organizations.

They were impressed, Glassman said, "by the quality of students they attracted. The majority are university or college graduates, very bright, but with little or no background in Judaism. They came often from assimilated homes, and were very serious about their studies."

Ohr Somayach has been in Toronto since 1981, current executive director Rabbi Elie Karfunkel told The CJN.

Its main facility here is the Temmy Latner Jewish Learning Exchange at 446 Spadina Ave. in Forest Hill. It also has a branch in Thornhill at 613 Clark Ave.

The Glassmans were struck by the high standard of the faculty, many of whom, Glassman said, had had no background or inclination towards Judaism, but had themselves gone through Ohr Somayach as students.

"What better litmus test can there be than that?" he asked.

But what really convinced them, he said, was "the ahavah – the love – that routinely came through, not just for us [as visitors].

"I spoke to the students. They see the rabbis as people to be looked up to, but also as friends that they can approach on any subject at any time of the day or night."

But most important to them, he said, was that the school didn't just teach religious practice, but stressed the importance of being a mensch.

Ohr Somayach's small quarters and general lack of funds also struck Glassman.

"They don't refuse any applicant for financial reasons – 50 per cent or more pay little or no tuition fees."

Impressed with the Toronto operation, led by Rabbi Karfunkel and his wife Rifkie, he decided to offer both "funds and moral support. I see myself as a catalyst in generating interest in what they stand for."

Glassman hopes Ohr Somayach may one day start a yeshiva in Toronto, perhaps similar to the Ohr Somayach Tanenbaum College in Jerusalem, and "maybe even a co-operative program with a university."

Rabbi Karfunkel came to Toronto Ohr Somayach nearly three years ago, after working as a rabbi in Oshawa. He found an organization that badly needed revitalization, after the death of its benefactor, Toronto philanthropist and businessman Joseph Tanenbaum.

One of the first things he and his family did was to move closer to the Spadina Avenue offices. That way, he said, they can be more involved in the local community.

"We go to the same barbershop, shop in some of the same stores, use the same bank," Rabbi Karfunkel said.

The first Friday night the Spadina Ohr Somayach had services, he said, "two people came – and one was moving away." Now, he said, new people come every week. Special events such as sukkah parties help to bind the participants together.

Every morning at 6 a.m. there is a study session, Rabbi Karfunkel said. There is also a monthly Friday night dinner, with a guest speaker, a women's Rosh Chodesh program, and classes in Talmud and philosophy, a sisterhood and a new afternoon school.

Hillel sues student union

However, the CSU has added a clause prohibiting speech or materials recruiting for any military or paramilitary organization.

The resolution requires all CSU-affiliated clubs to sign the same agreement and specifically mentions Solidarity for Palestinian Rights, or the club will face suspension of its funding. No deadline was fixed.

Bergman told The CJN that the amended resolution is a "misnomer" because, with its funding frozen, Hillel remains effectively shut down, as well as condemned without due process. "The CSU is playing word games... to appear to be backing off," he said.

As the suit outlines, the resolution tarnishes the reputation of Hillel by making it look as if it is breaking the law and as if Jewish students are "war-mongers... anti-social and racist."

Bergman says the university administration appears to be "dumbfounded" by the CSU and he does not accept its argument that the CSU is an independent legal entity over which it has no authority.

Canadian Jewish Congress said it will seek intervener status in the case and is soliciting donations to a legal assistance fund it has established for Hillel.

...As 2003 arrives

A new calendar hangs on the wall. But old fears and old apprehensions already fill its pages. Many experts and pundits are predicting that the American-led assault against the government of Iraq will begin in February. The UN arms inspectors will have completed their work by the end of January and will have delivered a definitive statement regarding Saddam Hussein's compliance with binding UN resolutions regarding his arsenal of weapons of mass destruction. A finding of non-compliance is expected.

Should war erupt, in addition to the American and allied combatants in the field, the chief danger from Iraq will be faced by non-combatant Israel. This is an irony of public policy in the strong-arm, non-democratic, militaristic tyrannies that pass for political regimes in the Middle East completely ignored by the anti-American, anti-globalization, anti-Israel activists and their apologists in the media whose consciences are moved to cries of deep anguish on behalf of Yasser Arafat and his fellow Palestinian leaders.

Hatred of the Jews, along with the scapegoating of Israel, is the galvanizing social force on the "Arab street." Saddam Hussein knows this, exploits it, indeed, foments it. Yet he seems to suffer no disapprobation for the devastation he promises to bring upon Israel from among those people whose chief calling, or permanent pastime is the public pummelling of the Jewish state. Nor do they express the tiniest shudder or even seem bothered by the spectre of Saddam's SCUD missiles or worse raining down on the civilian population of Israel.

The positioning by Hezbollah, along the south Lebanese border, of some 10,000 Iraqi and Iranian-acquired missiles aimed toward the heartland of Israel is also an inconvenient detail for the anti-Israel activists. They ignore this too, even though Hezbollah has let it be known it will launch its missiles at Israel if the Americans strike at Saddam.

As we have recently seen, Canadian anti-globalization champions and anti-Israel activists like Jaggi Singh and Svend Robinson are determined to embarrass Israel for its "occupation" of the West Bank and Gaza. But they are blind to the fact that three governments of Israel have tried to negotiate an end to that occupation, the last one rebuffed in so violent a manner that the entire negotiation process was destroyed in the process. They are blind to the fact that the occupation would end quickly if the Palestinian leaders would end the terrorism and violence against Israelis. They are blind to the coalition of radical, anarchic, Islamist groups and rejectionist Arab countries arrayed against the Jewish state. They are blind to the fact that this generation of Palestinian leaders has clearly said they do not want a peace treaty with Israel.

In the circumstances, we can only conclude that, along with their silence in the face of the grave Iraqi-Hezbollah threat facing the people of Israel, their blindness too is wilful.

A new year has begun; but the new calendar pages are already filled with old, tired and ominous stories.

Chief Ahenakew (1)

I am deeply disturbed by the extraordinary anti-Semitic and racist remarks made last month by Saskatchewan First Nations Senator David Ahenakew.

As national chief of the Assembly of First Nations, and on behalf of all First Nations and First Nations peoples from all regions of Canada, I unconditionally reject the repugnant, hateful, ignorant and slanderous remarks made by Ahenakew.

The Jewish people have been subjected – over thousands of years – to horrendous intolerance, discrimination, racism and various forms of genocide. Most recently, they were subjected to the horrors of the Shoah, in which six million men, women and children were tortured, gassed and murdered in just a few years for no other reason than that they were Jews.

Millions of people around the world, including hundreds of thousands of Canadians, responded to the call to defeat Nazi oppression and the march of fascism. Many, including a disproportionate number of First Nations people from Canada, gave their lives in the struggle against Hitler's evil in Europe and elsewhere.

For hundreds of years, indigenous peoples in Canada and elsewhere in the world have been – and are still – subjected to horrendous intolerance, discrimination, racism and various forms of genocide. We have cried out against these continuing injustices, and have been joined by decent and well-meaning people of many races and faiths – including many Jews – in doing so.

In his remarks, Ahenakew apparently also referred to events in the Middle East, and in an offensive manner to other races and to immigrants. These comments were also totally unacceptable.

There can never be any justification for racism or genocide anywhere. Accordingly, First Nations leaders and peoples in Canada reject and dissociate themselves from any action or expression of racism, bigotry and injustice, no matter whether they are aimed at us or at Jewish, Christian, Muslim, Hindu or any other people.

Matthew Coon Come
National Chief, Assembly of First Nations

Chief Ahenakew (2)

On behalf of the management, staff and clients of Na-Me-Res (Native Men's Residence), I am writing to publicly condemn the comments made last month by David Ahenakew, a former Native leader in Saskatchewan. We were all mortified by the ignorance and blatant racism displayed by Ahenakew. It is very sad to see that in this day and age, there are still individuals who perpetuate and harbour such anti-Semitic sentiments. From our point of view, it is even sadder that one of these individuals is a former Native leader who should have a better understanding of the legacy of racism and genocide.

At Na-Me-Res, we have been honoured to work for a number of years now with members of the Jewish faith to assist the homeless in Toronto. We have each learned much about each other's culture and have developed a long-standing friendship. Na-Me-Res believes that the sharing and support between our two cultures has benefited all of us and is a model for inter-cultural partnerships. We have brought many Aboriginal young people to tour the Holocaust Museum at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and to learn about the horrors experienced by our Jewish brothers and sisters.

In closing, let me again condemn the remarks made by Ahenakew. We feel both shame and embarrassment. However, these comments just prove that we must all continue to work together to make Toronto a better place and to ensure that our children do not grow up in a world of prejudice and distrust. We all deserve much better. Shalom.

Charlene Catchpole
President, Native Men's Residence

Premier Doer deserves accolades

Manitoba Premier Gary Doer, who was the guest speaker at the Jewish Foundation luncheon on Nov. 29, 2002, and who recently returned from Israel, has made several statements indicating that he stands shoulder-to-shoulder with Israel in its fight against terror.

At the luncheon, he implored the largely non-Jewish audience of about 600 people to take a stand against terrorists and terrorist attacks, indicating that he was not going to stand in the middle of the road. He said he was proud to stand with his Jewish friends and with Israel and implored others in government to do likewise. He made particular reference to Canadian Foreign Minister Bill Graham and to the Canadian government's unwillingness at that time to put Hezbollah on the list of terrorists. He also said that anti-Semitism must be fought every hour, every day and that he accepts that challenge.

Doer stands out as an example to other politicians in his willingness to speak out as he has and to undertake the challenges that he readily does.

Joseph Wilder
National Chair, Canada-Israel Committee

A voting conundrum

In a letter to the editor on Dec. 5, 2002, Stephen Stern asks why Jews vote Liberal. I also ask why anyone would vote Liberal. And I ask why anyone would vote Tory, since the Tories act against the interests of the ordinary person, who makes up 95 per cent of the population. And now that the NDP is supporting the Palestinians, I ask why any Jew would vote NDP.

Where does that leave Jews, or any Canadians for that matter, on voting day?

Edward Farkas

Images of 2002

The violence unleashed on Sept. 28, 2000 by the Palestinian leadership against the people of Israel continued apace last year. As of Dec. 28, 2002, 15,839 attacks had been launched against Israelis, with 4,910 individuals injured and 694 people killed.

Along with this campaign of violence against Israelis, we have also witnessed, alas, a rise in worldwide anti-Semitism.

The accompanying photos are a selection of some of the more compelling images, both happy and sad, from 2002.

The new anti-Semitism

Readers of this column are undoubtedly aware that anti-Semitism has been spreading like wildfire, especially in Europe.

When reading about it, most people are likely to assume that Germany is the place where the ancient plague has broken out again. It has reared its head there but, alas, Germany is neither the originator nor the chief locale of the disease.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Other countries that yesterday seemed unlikely to be infected have now succumbed to varying degrees. Great Britain and Holland, two nations that in the past resisted, at least to some degree, the widespread demonization of Jews have records in this regard that deserve our grateful memory.

I do not know for sure why this social illness has infected them also. Economic deterioration may be a contributing factor, but it is unlikely the main one.

According to recent reports, four countries in Europe now ban kosher slaughter within their borders, and one is considering halting even the importation of kosher meat.

People often wonder whether restrictions on kashrut are of necessity indications of anti-Semitism. Aren't there, they ask, decent individuals who ask questions about the degree of pain that the slaughtering process inflicts on an animal? Of course, there are many people, and especially vegetarians, who stress that this as an inevitable part of the killing process.

The fact is that all slaughtering is likely to raise some questions, and doing it does not prove the presence of anti-Semitism.

On the other hand, history teaches us that attacks on kashrut are all too often harbingers of the disease, so that restrictions such as those mentioned above must be looked upon with considerable concern.

For unfortunately, statistics show that a general attack on our people has become quite widespread in a number of European countries, and some believe that the disease has already spread to North America.

Fortunately, we have organizations that have been created to battle this social illness, but neither they nor anyone else can guarantee that the elimination of rishut (or wickedness, as the disease is called in Hebrew) lies ahead in the near future.

My personal opinion, which I have conveyed to my readers from time to time, is this: For all of us, there is the obligation to join communal groups that fight rishut, and otherwise to hang in.

We are a tough people and will survive all this. It is still Chanukah as I write, and its spirit strongly strengthens my conviction.

No more wasting my time and money

Just like millions of other Jews around the world, I did not celebrate Christmas with my family this holiday season.

But while most Jews forgo this yearly event because of their religion, I skipped it because I didn't have any to begin with.

Hailing from the former Soviet Union, my family never celebrated Christmas, even after they immigrated to Canada. Forced to be atheist under the rule of communism, they always saw Christmas as being a religious holiday – rather than the one of mass consumerism it actually is.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

Instead, as many Russians have done and still do, we celebrated New Year's Eve. As a child growing up, I suffered through a horrendous, tortured, week-long wait every year to get the same thing people my age would get on Christmas Eve.

We still had a tree – except it was called a New Year's tree. We still had presents, but instead of being delivered by Santa Claus they arrived courtesy of Ded Moroz, which in English translates into Old Man Frost.

We still waited until midnight to open the presents and decked the table out in a feast fit for a king – probably a Russian king, because he would have had to have liked caviar and smoked salmon and have been able to digest them well at any time of the day or night.

And as an added bonus, Ded Moroz didn't have to spend nearly as much money as Santa Claus because he was smart enough to take full advantage of Boxing Day sales.

But as I grew older and expanded my circle of friends, most of whom did celebrate Christmas, I found I hated being different from everybody else.

As far as Chanukah goes, I never did much more to celebrate it than eat potato latkes doused in sour cream.

So when I was invited to my friends' homes to celebrate Christmas with them, I happily came right over. To prepare, I willingly joined the crowds of manic shoppers swarming the malls every year like a horde of sheep.

After a while, it seemed as if Christmas really brought out the worst in people. It made them hand over their credit cards without thought for such questionable items as tacky door wreaths and crock pot warmers.

It brought a glazed-over look to their eyes – and the sharp corners their elbows suddenly developed as they rushed through the mall made them distinctly unapproachable.

I soon found that the sentiments I originally expressed with kindness and good cheer morphed into,"Oh my God, when will all this be over?"

I found out the hard way that when your only option for a Christmas gift is one of the last two pairs of Fruit of the Loom underpants sitting on otherwise empty shelves, God stays quite firmly out of the picture.

And that's probably what I should have done too, I would think to myself as I signed endless piles of holiday greeting cards.

Something in me finally snapped this year, leading me to a whole new resolution: No more wasting my time, my money or my breath.

This year for the holiday season, I skipped the mall and volunteered at a homeless shelter. Because amid the tinsel and the mistletoe and even the latkes in sour cream, it's so easy to forget what it's all about.

No matter what holiday you celebrate, it's about being grateful for what you have: The use of your limbs, a functioning brain and whatever family you might have around you.

A roof over your head that doesn't leak or let in the wind because it's not made out of cardboard.

The ability to eat three square meals a day and even more if you want them; the luxury of a day off; and a safe warm place to curl up in.

This year, instead of feeling like an outcast because someone will get a crock pot warmer a whole week earlier than I will, I wanted to remind myself of just how lucky I am.

And of how lucky I have always been.

A place I must go

As soon as the pen is laid down after my last exam, my brain embarks on its very own vacation. School is done, so thinking is out of the question.

And then I get home to see my parents, and a host of issues surface that need to be discussed. My brain is forced to shift right back into overdrive.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Don't get me wrong. I have a great relationship with my family, and ultimately, the main issue up for discussion comes from my own inner debate, not from my parents. I want to go to Israel this summer. Or to put it more accurately, I plan to go to Israel this summer.

This is not an impulsive decision.

I spend much of my school life learning about Israel, advocating for Israel and struggling to discover my own Jewish identity. Last summer, I had the opportunity to go to Israel, but I opted not to, out of consideration for my family's feelings.

My parents could never outright forbid me from doing something when they know I am choosing to do it for the right reasons. They raised an independent-minded daughter, and they allow me the freedom to make my own decisions.

Last year, I didn't feel secure enough in my desire to go Israel, so I could not justify putting my family through the emotional turmoil that might have resulted if anything had happened to me while I was there.

I don't know exactly what has changed in the past year. Maybe it's that one of my best friends in Halifax this year, Yael, came to Canada from Jerusalem for eight months. I listen to her, and I think of her family and life there.

It is so easy to distance ourselves from the reality of everyday life in Israel when we live in Canada. We see things there as little more than headlines in the newspaper. From the Diaspora, it is easy to feel comfortable with this distanced relation to our "homeland." We support Israel with dollars and words.

But looking into Yael's eyes and hearing her stories, I think I have come to understand that, given the present climate, Israel needs much more than dollars and words.

Life there goes on because people choose to go about their daily business. Families share their lives there. They share tragedy and they share joy.

Conviction is a crazy thing, and I know that when passion is involved, it can override rationality and diminish all perspective. At the same time, I understand what a trip to Israel entails. I know that suicide bombers strike without reprieve and anyone can be a target. I also know that you can't give in to terrorists, and the minute you stop living is the minute they win.

There is a burning feeling driving me on this one, and the sensation is something I can't quite convey in words.

I feel as if there is a part of me that is yet to be discovered. There are issues that need to be resolved and answers that I can't get in Toronto or Halifax.

There are so many reasons to go to Israel these days, and while I could say that solidarity is reason enough, I know that, personally, my current desire stems from so much more.

I am a thinker. I drive myself crazy, rationalizing everything. I weigh all options and try to maximize every ounce of potential. As I make my case to my parents, I am coming to understand that I am actually making my case to myself.

The journey I want to embark on is one of self-discovery. Right now, at this stage of my life, I feel that the answers I need can only be found in one place.

I can argue all sides in this argument, but when faced with the actual decision, I know how I feel.

Reason cannot always reign supreme. I regret not going to Israel last summer, but it was the decision I had to make at that time.

I can't provide my parents with the comfort I want to, and that's the one struggle I am left to confront.

What I understand now is that Israel is a part of me, and no amount of terror can erase that. What I cannot ignore is that I need to better understand that connection, and to do so, I have to experience it for myself.

The Kirshner File

Israel's hunt for Yehiya Ayyash

His name was Yehiya Ayyash, but he was popularly known as The Engineer. The object of one of the largest manhunts in Israeli history, he was a legendary master bomb maker and one of Israel's most formidable enemies. He wreaked death and destruction, killing and wounding scores of Israelis in a two-year reign of terror that prefigured the Palestinians' current suicide bombing campaign.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Before his assassination seven years ago this week, on Jan. 5, 1996, to be precise, Ayyash had achieved cult status among Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. His funeral in Gaza, thronged by 100,000 mourners, triggered an outpouring of grief, hatred and defiance.

Ayyash is the subject of Samuel Katz's clinical, fact-filled biography, The Hunt For The Engineer, which is published by the Lyons Press. Although the focus of the book is Ayyash, Katz – a specialist in Middle East security affairs and terrorism – builds his story around the development of Islamic fundamentalism in the territories.

Ayyash was born on Feb. 22, 1966, in the West Bank village of Rafat. The son of a field worker, he was the eldest of three boys. As an adolescent, he exhibited a natural gift for things mechanical and could repair any radio, television or appliance.

His dream, after graduating as an electrical engineer from Ramallah's Bir Zeit University, was to earn a master's degree in Jordan or the Gulf states. But when Israel vetoed his request to further his studies in Amman, he joined Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement, which Sheikh Ahmed Yassin had founded.

Recruited by Hamas' armed wing, the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigade, he was drawn to its volatile mixture of religiosity and militancy. Hamas, in essence, was an outgrowth of the Muslim Brotherhood, which had been established by Hassan al-Banna in Egypt in the late 1920s. In the territories, the Muslim Brotherhood provided a multiplicity of services through its network of nurseries, kindergartens, schools, daycares, sports clubs, clinics and mosques.

Israel allowed Hamas to operate freely as a counterweight to the secular Palestine Liberation Organization, headed by Yasser Arafat. Israel's toleration of Hamas was a calculated gamble that, in the final analysis, paid no dividends. Yassin, whose objective is, and always has been, the replacement of Israel by an Islamic state in Palestine, showed his true colours by ordering his associates to stockpile weapons and ammunition. In 1983, Yassin was arrested, tried, convicted and sentenced to 12 years in prison. He was released in 1985 as part of a prisoner exchange with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, General Command.

Hamas, financially supported by Iran and by wealthy businessmen in Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states, launched its first operations in Gaza. Its targets were Israeli soldiers and military personnel. After the kidnapping and murder of two soldiers – Avi Sasportas and Ilan Sa'adon – in 1989, Yassin was arrested yet again, and sentenced to 15 years behind bars. Katz regards his arrest as a turning point, the first salvo in the war waged by Israel against Hamas. Israel rounded up hundreds of its supporters and broke up many of its cells, but to no avail.

Amidst this turmoil, Ayyash became Hamas' chief bomb maker. He was a natural. Ayyash could effortlessly design circuits and produce cheap, reliable explosive devices. Most important, he passed on his knowledge to dozens of acolytes, whose murderous handiwork still plagues Israel.

When Ayyash arrived on the scene, he quickly realized that the explosives Palestinian suicide bombers had used were technically rather primitive. Learning from Hezbollah bomb makers, who were exacting a comparatively heavy toll on Israeli soldiers in southern Lebanon, he took his craft to the next deadly level.

On April 6, 1994, less than two months after Baruch Goldstein murdered 29 Palestinians in a Hebron mosque, a Palestinian drove an Opel next to a bus in Afula and detonated a bomb that Ayyash had built. The blast claimed the lives of several commuters, wrecked the bus and killed the suicide bomber, the first in a long procession of such bombers. A week later, another Hamas terrorist set off a bomb as a bus pulled into Hadera's commuter station. It killed six Israelis.

Having discovered Ayyash's identity, Israel went after him with a vengeance. But he was an elusive prey. He never slept in the same house or cave more than once. His movements were known only to a handful of fiercely loyal associates. He was an expert in disguising himself.

On Oct.19, 1994, Ayyash scored his biggest success yet when Saleh Abdel Rahim al-Souwi boarded the number 5 bus in central Tel Aviv, calmly flipped a switch and turned the vehicle into a raging fireball. Crammed with 20 kilograms of military-grade dynamite and nails and screws, the bomb was so powerful that it shook the United States embassy several blocks away. It was the deadliest suicide bombing so far, killing 21 people and wounding some 50.

Within days, Yitzhak Rabin, the prime minister, instructed the Mossad and the Shin Bet – Israel's internal intelligence agency – to seek out and destroy the leadership of Hamas. Rabin realized that these bombings were undermining the Oslo peace process, which Hamas opposed with every fibre of its being.

Yehiya Ayyash

Topping the list of terrorists to be eliminated was Ayyash. As Katz suggests, he had an advantage. He was smarter than any of the Hamas operatives Israel had previously targeted, and he was unlikely to be compromised by poor security. In addition, Ayyash could avail himself of a dizzying array of identity papers, driving licences and passports, and he could easily slip into the disguise of an Orthodox Jew, his facade of choice.

By now, Katz observes, Ayyash was a Palestinian national hero. "Folk songs were written about him, parents began naming their firstborns Yehiya and women embroidered tablecloths with his image."

In April 1995, Israel came close to nailing Ayyash. Having discovered his whereabouts in a flat in Gaza City's Sheikh Radwan district, Israeli agents rigged it with a bomb. The device obliterated the apartment and killed nine Arabs, including Ayyash's deputy operations officer. But Ayyash was not there when the bomb went off.

Vowing revenge, Hamas swiftly struck back, attacking a bus and a military convoy in Gaza. Nine soldiers and civilians were killed and 50 were wounded. Among the victims was an American student from Brandeis University, Elisa Flatow.

At this point, Ayyash became sloppy. He began communicating with his wife, who was expecting their second child in January 1996. The Shin Bet concluded that he could be brought down through his family.

Meanwhile, Ayyash was busy building more bombs. On July 24, 1995, the number 20 bus in Ramat Gan was blown up, with five fatalities. On Aug. 21, a pipe bomb destroyed the number 26 bus in Jerusalem, causing the deaths of five passengers. In September, the Palestinian Authority promised to co-operate in the hunt for Ayyash, who was assumed to be somewhere in Gaza.

Ayyash's downfall was the result of sheer luck and excellent intelligence work. In late 1995, he found refuge with an old friend and fellow Hamas member named Osama Hamad. His uncle, Kamil Hamad, was a merchant who happened to be a Shin Bet informer. The long and short of it is that Kamil purchased a cellular phone for Osama, who had no clue it had been planted with a microchip eavesdropping device and 50 grams of RDX explosives. On Jan. 5, 1996, Ayyash answered a call, his last one. The blast blew away the right side of his face and shattered his brain. Hamas retaliated with a series of devastating suicide bombings in February and March that killed more than 60 Israelis.

Ayyash's star pupil and successor, Mohammed Dief, survived an assassination attempt last September. Ayyash is dead but his brutal legacy lingers on like a whiff of death.

Make an example of him

Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew has tearfully apologized for his incredibly crude and monstrously untrue remarks about Jews. But the story should not end with his apparent contrition. If James Keegstra, in the 1980s, was prosecuted for Holocaust denial, what kind of punishment should Ahenakew face for justifying the greatest crime in history? At a minimum, he should be stripped of his Order of Canada. More to the point, he must be charged under the Criminal Code with inciting genocide. If an example is not made of this crass, ignorant, stupid racist, the wrong conclusions will be drawn by Canadians.

New and noteworthy resources

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Now that the Ellis Island Database of passenger arrivals to New York City has revolutionized the once frustrating hit-and-miss task of searching for a U.S. passenger arrival by long-distance mail, genealogists may wonder what new technological aids have appeared recently that can ease the task for those searching Canadian ports of call.

While it doesn't contain the names of passengers, the ShipsList CD-ROM of Passenger Ship Arrivals to Canadian ports from 1865 to 1899 is a significant step forward.

The ShipsList database can help researchers pinpoint a likely ship and port where an ancestor may have disembarked. From there, it's a relatively simple matter to order the corresponding passenger manifest on microfilm from the National Archives of Canada, available by inter-library loan. (The North York Central Library has a full set of these microfilms.)

The ShipsList database is a significantly improved finding aid over the National Archives' own catalog. It was compiled by Gery and Sue Swiggum of Nova Scotia, who are currently working on a second CD to cover the period from 1900 onward.

ShipsList shows every ship arrival for which the National Archives filmed a passenger manifest. It is easily searchable via numerous fields – departure port, departure year, arrival port, arrival year, ship name, shipping line, etc. – either separately or in combination. One of its nicest features is that it offers photographs and descriptions of most vessels listed.

For Jewish researchers, the ports of call may seem quite sparse: the Swiggums assert that no ocean liners sailed to Canada from Libau, Riga, Odessa or many other European ports before 1899. However, many European Jews sailed indirectly via London, Liverpool and other British ports, which are well represented.

Canadian passenger lists usually contain less information than their American counterparts. A manifest of Jews arriving from Liverpool to Montreal aboard the vessel Lake Ontario in 1899, for example, indicates only names, sex, occupation, country of birth and final destination. In this case, many were travelling on to the American Midwest. It was supposedly easier and cheaper in those days to travel inland as far as possible by water before switching to rail travel for the rest of the journey.

Order the ShipsList CD-ROM on the Web at www.theshipslist.com.

"I do not speak Yiddish, nor have I ever lived in Stropkov," writes Melody Amsel. "I am simply the great-granddaughter of Yossl Amsel; the granddaughter of Shia Amsel, who immigrated to America in 1904; and a relative of many Stropkovers who perished in the Holocaust."

Amsel's words appear in the introduction of Between Galicia and Hungary: The Jews of Stropkov, a modern remembrance book published by Avotaynu, Inc. Amsel wanted to do more than just memorialize her own family, and so she conducted extensive research in order to write about all the Jews of Stropkov. The Slovakian town once had a community of 2,000 Jews. Only 162 survived the Holocaust.

The book offers a history of the Jews of Stropkov, from their first presence in about 1640 to 1945. Instead of the usual necrology, it lists all Jews of the town and neighbouring communities, identifying Holocaust survivors in bold face. It also features extensive photographs. It was published in English with its contents mirrored in Hebrew. It's available in Jewish bookstores or via the Web at www.avotaynu.com.

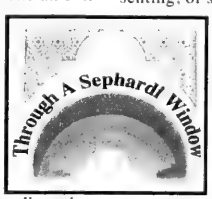
Guarding against the evil eye

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Ayin hara – Hebrew for the evil eye – has preoccupied people for as long as there have been people.

One of the earliest surviving records of law, known as Hammurabi's Code, deals extensively with the "crime" of giving someone an evil eye and its punishment. Today, concern for the evil eye is regarded as primitive and the worry of the ignorant and superstitious.



The Torah, however, validates the concept of ayin hara, but it is not the same one of popular misconception. The Torah tells us that when Jacob presented his family for the first time to his estranged brother Esau, Joseph stood in front of his mother Rachel to "save" her from Esau's evil eye. For this act, Joseph, we are told, is blessed in that neither he nor his descendants will be subject to the evil eye.

How does the evil eye affect the one being looked at? The evil eye works like an ill wish, something akin to an unspoken curse. Just as a verbal curse is a request that God bring about a given doom to an individual, the jealous, resentful person makes a similar request through the evil eye.

The power of the evil eye is the power of negativity: of seeing and resenting, of seeing and belittling, of seeing and wishing ill. It is wordless, and, in fact, may even be unconscious, but it is an ill wish nonetheless.

Ayin hara is really not that much different than lashon hara, which is Hebrew for evil talk-gossip, tale bearing and slander.

It is sufficiently clear how gossip and slander can damage the life and reputation of the subject of the defamatory talk. But it is also very clear how unfortunate and negative it is for the speaker, who speaks, hears and sees bad in everything. The evil eye too, is as harmful to the beholder as it is to the one seen, for the former is the source of negativity.

There are many customs relating to ayin hara in the way of "protective" amulets and adornments such as the form of a fish or a hand (hamsa). There are also the many varied customs when complimenting someone, such as to add "kenayna hara," "bli ayin hara" or the like, and even to feign spittle as if to negate a compliment.

Certainly, the greatest guard against the evil eye is in not giving it too much credence, while at the same time not flaunting oneself or being ostentatious.

God desires a world where people live their lives in a positive way. Hence, the ideal of "speak no evil, hear no evil and see no evil." We are told to be good, see good, be well spoken and entertain only good wishes for others.

Just as there is real substance to the evil eye, there is also the ayin tov, the good and positive eye. The ayin tov is vision that sees the blessings and accomplishments of others and rejoices with them and for them. It is a look that speaks of happiness and encouragement.

In the words of King Solomon, "that good look alone is a blessing."

Israeli elections & the Internet – part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

As Israelis prepare to vote on January 28, they'll be sizing up hundreds of candidates for Knesset, choosing between dozens of official political parties, scrutinizing the candidates for prime minister and clicking through dozens of Web sites designed to steer voters through this complicated maze.

Even if you don't have a vote, you can benefit from the massive information available on the World Wide Web and follow developments in this crucial election. Before this month's election, we'll check out the political parties' Web site and take a look at the candidates running for prime minister. But first, an introduction to politics, Israel style.

Understanding Israel's electoral system can be a bit daunting to a foreigner. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs has put together an impressive site that explains the country's system of government and the events that led to the election call [http://www.mfa.gov.il/]. A similar site (with a great name) is The Israeli Elections – Guide for the Perplexed, which also has background on the parties and people who have shaped previous Israeli elections [http://shlk.com/272]. And political junkies will love the Jewish Virtual Library, which summarizes the final standings of every election since the creation of the state [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/Politics/mktoc.html].

If you are more interested in the contemporary goings-on in the political scene, the following two sites should give you your fill. The Jerusalem Post's Elections 2003: Israel Decides is a great site with extensive information on the history, the issues and the people making news [http://info.jpost.com/ C002/Supplements/Elections2003]. Also, don't miss the excellent English-language edition of Ha'aretz [http://shlk.com/275]. The Jerusalem Report bi-weekly concentrates on feature articles [http://www.jrep.com/], while Globes looks at Israeli news from a business perspective [http://www.globes.co.il/]. Note: Some newspaper sites require registration, but they are all free.

One of my favourite sites is the Green Screen News Library for Middle East and Israel [http://www.gsnonweb.com/]. This amazing site carries the latest stories from Reuters, Associated Press, the Jerusalem Post and Ha'aretz. But what it makes it truly valuable is that it has a fully searchable archive of 100,000 articles dating back to January 1998.

As good as those sites are, if you want to get a complete view of the campaign with all the local nuances, then you need sites in Hebrew. The Ha'aretz site has news, features, a timetable and background on the parties and candidates [http://shlk.com/276]. Also check out coverage in the popular Yedioth Aharonot [http://www.ynet. co.il/].

If you would rather listen to the news from Israel, the Voice of Israel provides Hebrew, English and French language newscasts daily [http://www.israelradio.org]. Or if you have a fast computer and Internet connection, you can even watch daily TV coverage in English and Hebrew from the Israel Broadcasting Authority [http://mabat.iba.org.il].

Every candidate has one goal in mind – to get to the Knesset. But you don't have to get elected to get in. All you need is a keyboard to enter the Knesset [http://www.knesset.gov.il]. At this bilingual site, you can learn how Israel's parliament functions and watch debates online (when in session). If you get tired, take a seat in the Chagall State Hall and watch a movie about those incredible mosaics and tapestries [http://www.knesset.gov.il/tour/eng/etour7.htm]. You probably won't bump into any members of Knesset wandering down these virtual corridors, but their e-mail addresses are listed [http://www.knesset.gov.il/mk/eng/mkintro_eng.htm].

Next time, I will look at the parties and personalities running for the 16th Knesset.

Although "Mozilla" isn't as famous as Netscape or Internet Explorer, I have been pleasantly surprised by how well it allows you to read Hebrew language Web sites. Simply download the free software from Mozilla, [http://www.mozilla.org] install it and visit one of Hebrew sites I mentioned above. B'hatzlachah!

Unrequited love

The Pity of It All*, by Amos Elon Metropolitan Books, 2002, $44.95

German Jews loved their country with a fierce passion. Frederic Grunfeld, in his book Prophets Without Honour, wrote that had the end not been so awful, we would now hail the decades before the Nazi rise to power as "a golden age second only to the Italian Renaissance."

Books
Bernard Baskin

Never more than one per cent of the population, Jews were astonishingly productive.

In literature they accounted for such luminaries as Heine, Borne, Kafka, Werfel, Zweig, Wolfskehl, Broch, and Kraus; in science, Willstatter, Haber, Ehrlich, Einstein, and Freud; in music, Mahler, Weill, Schoenberg, and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

Given the Jew's late entry into European civilization, the wealth and variety of their contribution to the arts and sciences was startling.

At the outbreak of World War I, Hermann Cohen, the renowned philosopher, spoke for most Jews when he proclaimed that the "God of justice and love" was sure to grant Germany a "heroic victory" over her wicked enemies. He even offered to travel to the United States to convince American Jews that Germany's motives were pure and its cause a model for the entire world.

Anti-Semitism was rife and conversion to Christianity was widespread – usually not out of conviction, but for a variety of secular reasons.

But many Jews clung tenaciously to their faith as a badge of honour.

Arthur Scholem, for example, the father of Gershom Scholem, the famous scholar of Jewish mysticism, felt that conversion was an "unprincipled, servile act" and avoided those of his relatives who had left the ancestral faith. Nonetheless, Scholem was a so-called Christmas Jew, celebrating both Jewish and Christian holidays.

Unlike some historians who maintain the Holocaust was the inevitable result of hundreds of years of German anti-Semitism, Elon argues that it didn't have to happen.

"Alongside the Germany of anti-Semitism there was a Germany of enlightened liberalism, humane concern, and civilized rule of law, good government, social security, and thriving social democracy. Even Hitler's rise to power was not the result of electoral success (the Nazi's share of the vote had seriously declined in the fall of 1932). Rather, Hitler's triumph was the product of backstage machinations by conservative politicians and industrialists who overcame the hesitation of a senile president by convincing him (and themselves) that they were 'hiring' Hitler to restore order and curb the trade unions."

Installing Hitler as chancellor was not the only alternative at the time, he argues.

Elon, the talented Israeli author and novelist, begins his history with a portrait of philosopher Moses Mendelssohn, who arrived in Berlin at age 14 in 1743 and went on to become the "German Socrates." He ends with the coming of the Nazis to power in 1933.

Between these two events – almost two centuries apart – The Pity of It All paints a portrait of a many-sided society, rich in its human tapestry and the acuity of its social insights.

But the book is also a tragic story, a collective biography of people whose love and loyalty to their beloved homeland were not reciprocated.

Teach, don't preach, says McGill dean

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

"Science raises questions about the accuracy of biblical narratives," says McGill professor B. Barry Levy.

For example, he says, the Jews didn't build the pyramids. And the first plague "may have been something other than blood, with hemoglobin."

The dean of religious studies at McGill University was in Toronto last month for a study program called Not in Heaven: Torah in Human Hands, held on Asarah b'Tevet at Beth Jacob Congregation.

In his talk, Torah Study: Teaching or Preaching, Levy explored the differences between preaching, often called homiletics, the rabbinical analysis of Torah texts, and teaching, a more objective form of study, using the texts themselves. Levy, who places himself firmly in the teaching tradition, said that teaching is a lost art.

"As a community, we have lost track of teaching in favour of preaching," he said.

"Modern study is tilted towards rabbinics, not text. Orthodox Jews don't preach from the Bible, they preach from Chazal [acronym for "our sages of blessed memory"]. They take a motif... from the weekly Torah reading and use Chazal to expound on it."

> 'Science raises questions about the accuracy of biblical narratives'

Though he has smichah, Levy has only served once as a pulpit rabbi, for a short time during Pesach one year. The interviewers for the position asked him if he was planning to say "anything heretical from the bimah." His answer: "Not heretical, but maybe controversial."

The author of six books, including Fixing God's Torah, seems both surprised and delighted at the controversy that has greeted his work. In the case of his pulpit position, he told the interviewers he didn't believe that Jewish slaves built the Egyptian pyramids, and cited biblical and archaeological evidence to back up his statement.

The interviewers believed this was indeed controversial and made him promise not to talk about history during his short stay. He says with a smile that he hasn't been asked back.

"They were afraid that preaching would be undermined by real history," he said.

Preaching, he acknowledged, certainly has value for reinforcing faith messages or offering strength. "A preacher... is not interested in having his audience's faith undermined."

But because a preacher's primary concern is the listener, he said, preaching inevitably twists Torah texts into "forms the original writers of the Bible wouldn't have recognized."

Despite his respect for preaching, Levy sees his task as addressing a lack of erudition in critical Torah study.

"The most experience Jews have today [with Torah study] comes in the form of sermons, rather than text study," he said. Even in institutions of higher learning, Torah is deprecated in favour of Talmudic knowledge. "Not all yeshivas do Bible study," he said. "It's [seen as] a subject for women... it's not prized, it's suspect."

He referred to what he called complacency within mainstream Orthodoxy.

"You can't suspend all intellectual judgment in the process of trying to be frum [religious]," he said.

Without a deeper knowledge of Tanach, these texts may not survive our own complacency, Levy warned, comparing Torah to clay.

"It's shaped by each generation. As long as we continue to work with the clay, it will stay soft and pliable." But if we avoid engaging it, he said, "it will harden into a brittle object... becoming something you'd see in a museum... or an idol."

True teaching will make Torah accessible to each new generation, who "must study from different perspectives," without relying on homiletical interpretations of previous leaders.

For Levy, there is nothing wrong with incorporating science, archeology or any other modern discipline to advance the cause of Torah study. He seems to delight in being an anomaly, aware, for instance, that his belief that parts of the book of Daniel may be more parable than fact is not likely to be universally adopted in Orthodox circles.

Not in Heaven: Torah in Human Hands also featured speakers Shnayer Leiman of Brooklyn College and Eric Lawee of York University.

Leiman's talk, The Shock of the New: Rabbinic Responses to Modernity, set the stage for Levy with a discussion of early rabbis who attempted to reconcile modern life through their dress, use of the vernacular and reform of liturgy and synagogue decorum within the framework of Halachah.

Lawee spoke on Reactions to Rashi: Respect, Resistance, Reverence and Ruach Hakodesh, looking at the responses to the work of the medieval scholar.

The all-day event was the second program this fall sponsored by Torah in Motion.

Author finds his niche with a map

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Alan Morantz is big on maps, and has been since the day Canadian Geographic asked him to assemble stories around that theme for its 70th anniversary issue.

As lead editor of its special edition, Morantz soon developed a deep appreciation of, and love for maps.

Like many others before him, he discovered that the world of maps is infinitely rich in history and lore.

So much so that he decided to write a book about the subject.

On Oct. 19, Penguin Books published Where Is Here? Canada's Maps and the Stories They Tell.

Maps are important because they essentially chronicle Canada's evolution as a nation, said Morantz, a Montrealer who lives in Kingston, Ont.

In this intriguing book, he fleshes out two interrelated ideas – how we shape maps and how maps mould us – and launches into a discussion of cartography.

Morantz claims that aboriginals – the first Canadians – produced sophisticated maps based on oral traditions and sacred scrolls.

"They had an incredible sense of cartography," he said in an interview.

The Cree chief, Ochagach, drew the first depiction of the land between Lake Superior and the prairies for the European explorer Pierre de La Verendrye.

And the French explorer, Samuel de Champlain, created what Morantz describes as Canada's "mother map."

In 1613, he made the first successful attempt to lay down the latitudes and longtitudes for a map of the Atlantic coast.

Two centuries later, David Thompson completed his magum opus – Map of America Between Latitude 40 and 70 North and Longitude 80 and 150 West.

Jesuit missionaries, who were in the map-making business too, exerted an immense impact on Canadian cartography as well.

Some of their maps, particularly of the Great Lakes, have generally stood the test of time, he noted.

More recently, topographical maps have been used in the exploration of natural resources from Newfoundland to British Columbia.

And in the future, he observed, flat-view maps will yield to orthographic views of the planet, and real-time mapping of, say, forest fires, will become commonplace.

Nearly two years in the making, Where Is Here? is his first book under his own byline.

He dedicates it to four important people in his life: his parents, Joe and Mollie, who ran Montreal's landmark Snowdon Delicatessen for decades; his wife Suzanna Keller, an epidemiologist, and his 16-year-old daughter, Katie.

As a freelance editor, Morantz ghost wrote Inuksuit, a book about Inuit stone carvings in the Arctic. A former editor of Equinox, he has contributed to Cottage Life.

Morantz, a graduate of Wagar High School and Concordia University, is currently communications and development manager of the Industrial Relations Centre at Queen's University.

His sister, Cheryl, runs the Centre Street Deli. Ironically, Morantz is a vegetarian, having been one since 1988.

A resident of Kingston since 1990, Morantz is former president of Beth Israel, Kingston's only synagogue with a permanent building.

"The map of love"

Asian studies draws interest of Carleton prof

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Asia has long piqued Martin Rudner's interest.

"It has been an attraction to me since childhood," said the director of Carleton University's Centre for Security and Defence Studies.

A political science professor who also teaches at Carleton's Norman Patterson School of International Affairs, he plunged into Asian studies while at McGill University in the late 1950s.

"I took every course on Asia," he recalled, saying he gravitated toward that continent for two good reasons.

"It was the least well-studied field at the time, especially in Canada, and it represented many of the important challenges to international affairs and human development."

He was particularly drawn to Malaysia and Indonesia, Muslim countries with large multicultural and multiethnic populations that have mastered modernity.

In 1968, armed with BA and MA degrees from McGill, Rudner enrolled at Hebrew University to further his knowledge of Asia and of the process of modernization. Among his teachers were the renowned Israeli scholars S.N. Eisenstadt and H.Z. Schiffrin.

While in Jerusalem, Rudner became a founding member of Hebrew University's department of East Asian studies and director of the Asian research unit at the Harry S. Truman Institute for the Advancement of Peace.

Looking back at his seven-year interregnum in Israel, Rudner observed: "Only one word can describe it: transcendental. The learning, the creativity, the optimism, the energy and, yes, the struggles and challenges, positively shaped my values and outlook."

Since then, he has transformed himself into one of Canada's foremost authorities on Asia, a region he likes immensely. "As a Canadian Jewish scholar, one identified with Israel, I found my connections with Malaysia and Indonesia to have been cordial, fruitful and, I hope, mutually beneficial."

Martin Rudner

Having taken the academic dictum "publish or perish" to heart, Rudner has written three books on Asia: Nationalism, Planning and Economic Modernization in Malaysia, Canada and the Philippines and Malaysian Development.

He has also edited five books, notably Society and Development in Asia and Canada Among Nations, and has produced a stream of monographs.

Rudner has used his expertise as a commentator on CBC radio and television, as a guest lecturer at universities in Australia, Japan, Malaysia, Singapore, Indonesia, Taiwan and the United States, and as an advisor to the Canadian International Development Agency.

Middle Eastern affairs fascinate him as well. He teaches a graduate course on Mideast economic and political relations, and in his media commentaries, he addresses Mideast problems.

Asked about Canada's policy on the Arab-Israeli conflict, he said: "Canada's approach is grounded on a principle that reasonable people on all sides can and should talk, and through interaction can build mutual confidence, forge shared interests and adjust themselves to the pursuit of peace."

Canadian objectives, however, are thwarted by "malevolent forces" that seek exactly the opposite. "They initiate violence to undermine the peacemakers, heighten hatred and destroy any chance of a reasonable solution."

He added: "It is important that Canada and other countries recognize that this evil exists and take steps to forcefully combat these enemies of peace in order to demonstrate support and encouragement for the peacemakers."

In his view, Islamic terrorism will preoccupy the West for years to come. "It is a profound and far-reaching threat to democracies, world Jewry and moderate Muslim societies everywhere."

Is Islamism as great a threat to the West as Communism was before its dissolution in the late 1980s and early 1990s?

"Jihadists," like Communists in the past, are antagonistic to the West's values, he replied. They abhor democracy, economic liberalism, cultural enlightenment, civic equality and global connectivity.

"These values, being antithetical to Islamic fundamentalism, are demonized by Jihadists," said Rudner, who is currently writing a book about Canada's intelligence community in the era of global terrorism.

Rudner believes Canada is experiencing difficulty identifying its interests on current issues such as Iraq.

"Canada shares the United Nations' concern about Iraq's efforts to acquire weaponry of mass destruction," he said. "Yet Canada seems ambivalent about addressing the problem of regime change in Iraq."

When it comes to Iraq's aggressive government, he said, Canada is reticent about enforcing its principles of democratization and human rights.

Canada should play an active, constructive and visionary role abroad, Rudner noted. "Our objectives should aim at the promotion of peace and security, the betterment of the human condition, the expansion of trade opportunities and the management of sound environmental conditions."

But if Canada is to pursue its national interests successfully, he warned, it must commit additional funds to the Canadian military.

In the wake of last year's terror attacks in Manhattan and Washington, D.C, Canada has no alternative but to preserve its close relationship with the United States, Rudner said, adding that despite some disagreements, Canada and the United States share basic values and objectives.

Now 60, Rudner was born and raised in Montreal, the son of Moe and Esther Rudner. He is a graduate of Adath Israel Academy in Outremont.

Rudner's daughter, Aliza, works for the Canadian International Development Agency. His first and second wives, Judith and Susan, both died of cancer.

Portrait of MP removed from Vancouver JCC

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A local artist was asked to remove a portrait of MP Svend Robinson from an exhibit of her collected works at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver recently after members of the community – particularly Holocaust survivors – complained it was offensive.

Jeannie Kamins said she included the portrait of the New Democratic Party's MP for Burnaby-Douglas, who is an outspoken critic of Israel's policy toward the Palestinians, because it is one of her best works, not because she wanted to offend anyone.

Kamins, a former JCC employee, said she painted Robinson's picture in 1992 "as part of a series of portraits of people who I feel have integrity, political commitment and who are controversial."

She stressed that her exhibition, called "Unsung Heroes," did not have a political agenda. "I think the people who complained... want to stifle controversy," she said. "They're pig-headed, narrow-minded bigots."

Gerry Zipursky, the JCC's executive director, declined to comment for this story, but he told the Western Jewish Bulletin newspaper last month that he would raise this issue at a future meeting of the centre's new board of directors, but said the matter was not about freedom of expression.

"We are clear about our loyalty and support and relationship with Israel," he told the paper. "That doesn't mean to say that there can't be freedom of expression, but if people try to make issues political in nature, in our view, we try to remain apolitical."

During a visit to the West Bank last April, Robinson was recorded by a TV news crew confronting Israeli soldiers in Ramallah as he attempted to reach Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat during a siege of Arafat's headquarters.

On his return to Canada, Robinson said the Israeli government and military were "guilty of torture and murder."

The NDP susequently relieved him of his responsibilities as party spokesperson on Mideast issues.

While Kamins said it was Robinson's politics that led her to create the portrait in the first place, the portrait is "not a political piece," she said.

"It's outrageous that I should be judged by what I put in when it was not a political piece, but a picture of a man sitting on a bench. This is not free speech," she said.

"What is important is why it was removed and how decisions of exclusion are determined at the JCC."

Claire Belilos, a member of Vancouver's Jewish community, disagrees.

"When you exhibit somewhere, you have to consider their values and policies, and if you don't like those policies, you go elsewhere," she said. "I think Kamins showed a total lack of sensitivity by exhibiting that piece, because Svend has proven by his actions and words that he's an enemy of Israel. How would you like it if she painted a portrait of Hitler and showed it there, at the JCC, calling it free expression?"

Hamilton's Genesis helps develop leaders with vision, commitment

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Genesis, the Jewish Leadership Development Program here, is designed to develop community leaders with vision and commitment.

"The old model of recruiting volunteers who are desperately needed for a certain project" is flawed, said Wendy Schneider, the program's facilitator. "If you start with a person and discover that person's passions, interests and skills, you can direct them to do something in the community that reflects who they are."

The program also offers its participants the opportunity for personal growth in a nurturing environment, she said, although some of the program's challenges may prove to be slightly intimidating.

"Leadership is about going beyond your comfort zone; it's stretching your boundaries," Schneider said in an interview.

> 'Leadership is about going beyond your comfort zone'

She described an exercise in a recent orientation session that made some people feel uncomfortable. A large pie-shaped circle had been drawn on the floor. Inside each wedge was a word describing an approach to leadership. Participants were required to walk around the circle, then step into a wedge that they considered best described their leadership style. The next step in the exercise was to repeat the process, this time stepping into a wedge that least described their leadership style.

Participants were asked to consider why they identified with the descriptive word in the first wedge. Then they were asked to consider how they could change their leadership approach so they would be the type of leader described in the second wedge.

"It was a provocative exercise. Some people felt exposed," Schneider said.

Even though some participants feel uncomfortable facing new challenges, the group is entirely supportive of one another, she said.

Prior to the June closing session of the 2002 Genesis program, participants were asked to e-mail a positive comment about each member to the leader. The comments were read out loud at the meeting.

"It was a self-affirming, growing experience."

The Genesis program also includes the study of Jewish leaders in the Torah. As well, each participant is required to research, prepare and present a d'var Torah to the group. Some participants initially are nervous about this assignment, especially the public speaking component. However, once they've met the challenge, their confidence level dramatically increases, Schneider said.

Two years ago, Genesis, a project of the UJA Federation of Hamilton, was piloted as an 18-month program focusing on the goal of positive community change. Starting in January 2003, new sessions of the revised year-long program will be held monthly, except for July and August.

Schneider designed the 2003 Genesis program with the assistance of two members of the pilot program and a consultant from Bay Area Leadership of Hamilton and Burlington. The emphasis was on a three-pronged approach with the goals of personal growth, becoming effective in an organization in order to effectively contribute to the community, and appreciation of Jewish values.

Participants are required to commit to attend 90 per cent of the sessions. As well, they are expected to implement and design a project to serve the Hamilton Jewish community.

To date, 21 people have registered for the upcoming Genesis program. The number of participants will be limited to 24. Participants vary in age and they have diverse backgrounds, Schneider said.

"Federation has recognized that if this community is going to have a future, it has to invest in future leaders," Schneider said. "I believe that everyone has the potential to be a leader; it is just a matter of drawing them out... My commitment is to facilitate that in people, to help them see their own brilliance."

MONTREAL — Aboriginal leader Matthew Coon Come's Shabbat talk on Dec. 21 at a synagogue that condemned an anti-Semitic diatribe by his predecessor David Ahenakew was hailed as a welcome and vital step by Jewish community leaders.

"There was a clear sense that this was an important and significant gesture," said David Birnbaum, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), in an interview. "He was unequivocal in his condemnation and very generous in talking about the friendship and empathy between the two communities."

Birnbaum said Coon Come, the national chief of the Assembly of First Nations, approached CJC in Ottawa earlier in the week about the possibility of speaking at a synagogue in Montreal while he was in the city for the weekend.

After discussing the issue with Rabbi Howard Joseph, Birnbaum and other CJC officials chose Shearith Israel in Cote des Neiges, which is known as the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, as the venue.

The synagogue, which is Canada's oldest congregation, is Sephardi Orthodox, though the media were invited to wait outside to speak with Coon Come and take photographs following the services.

Coon Come was reportedly strong in his condemnation of Ahenakew, who had said in comments last month to a reporter in Saskatoon that Adolf Hitler was right to "fry" six million Jews, whom Ahenakew called a "disease."

In his brief address to about 200 congregants, Coon Come reportedly said he needed to express his "outrage" directly to a Jewish audience and praised the Jewish record of fighting for human rights, including on behalf of aboriginal peoples. He was present for most of the service, and later took part in the weekly kiddush, Birnbaum said.

Coon Come also made reference to the week's Torah portion – the final chapter of Genesis – and recited a prayer in his native language, Cree, Birnbaum said. "You could have heard a pin drop."

Coon Come was accompanied by Victor Goldbloom, chair of CJC-Q's executive committee and former commissioner of official languages in Canada.

Birnbaum said Coon Come has made it clear that the aboriginal tradition required a "clear and sincere" apology for Ahenakew's comments and that there be some type of "restitution" for the remarks, as well as "consequences."

On Dec. 17, Ahenakew apologized for his remarks and resigned from his affiliation with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations. But Saskatchewan's attorney-general Chris Axworthy indicated he would continue to consider a criminal complaint against him.

Cotler defends activist

Ibrahim was charged on a four-count indictment: conspiring to bribe public officials, receiving grant funds from the European Commission (EC) without permission, disseminating false information and malicious rumours to foreign organizations, and attempting to defraud the EC.

Cotler, who prepared much of the defence's legal briefs, said the case against Ibrahim was a sham from the start and was marked by "one absurdity after another."

Not only were international procedural norms of justice ignored, but the charges are without merit, Cotler said. "There is absolutely not a shred of evidence of any of these charges," he said, adding that the law used against Ibrahim is also unconstitutional.

Cotler, who has defended former political prisoners such as Natan Sharansky, Andrei Sakharov and Nelson Mandela, believes Ibrahim has been persecuted for doing nothing more than advocating democracy. "It's a case of the old totalitarian mindset: give us the person and we'll find the crime.

"Ibrahim is a leader of the democracy movement and human rights in the Arab world," Cotler said, adding that his influence led the Egyptian Organization for Human Rights, an organization Ibrahim founded, to publicly denounce Horseman Without A Horse, a recently aired Egyptian television series based on the Protocols of The Elders of Zion.

"I think that's an example of his courage," Cotler stated.

Ibrahim, who has visited Israel, has many supporters in the Jewish state and several Arab NGOs have rallied to his support, as have Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch. The government of Canada has also taken an interest in the case and the Canadian ambassador to Egypt visited Ibrahim three times in prison. Earlier, 61 members of the U.S. Congress wrote to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak protesting Ibrahim's conviction.

Cotler said the case may well "strike a blow for the rule of law and the democratic movement... It will mean more democratic space for the budding and incipient human rights movement in Egypt."

That could also prove important for the rest of the Arab world and even for the Arab-Israeli peace process, he added.

Book tells retiree's tale of survival

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — It is a remarkable story that sounds like a Hollywood thriller.

My Three Selves, a memoir of Morris Schnitzer's survival of the Holocaust, describes a privileged and pleasant life torn asunder by Hitler's madness. It also details how, through cunning, ingenuity and sheer luck, a young man triumphed over the forces of evil and lived to make award-winning contributions to science.

Schnitzer's story may never have been told. He was reluctant to write it and when he did, at the urging of his late wife, Leah, he was unable to find a publisher.

More than two decades later, his daughter Eve Schnitzer found the manuscript and urged her father to publish it. He was also encouraged by his friend, Prof. Seymour Mayne, who read the manuscript and enlisted the aid of several community members to ensure its publication.

"Why did I write this book?" asked Schnitzer at the recent book launch at Ottawa's Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC). "It was a memorial to my mother, father and brother [who was 17 years old] who died. They never committed a crime. They were good citizens of Germany. My father had even done military service there."

Now 80 years old and retired from his work at the federal government's Experimental Farm in Ottawa, Schnitzer began life in the small town of Wattenscheid in the Ruhr Valley in western Germany.

His father, a successful merchant, was an observant Jew and a patriotic German. His patriotism may have been the family's downfall: as other relatives began to leave Germany, he refused to leave illegally and was unable to realize how bad the situation really was.

Young Morris and his brother Eddi were finally sent away. Eddi found his way to Canada, but Morris began an incredible odyssey through Europe that saw him assume three different identities – hence the title of the book– in various countries, always one step ahead of death.

"I was in jail in Germany, Holland, Belgium, France and Switzerland. I was in solitary confinement many times," Schnitzer said.

Even now, Schnitzer said, when he sees a jail he becomes very sad. "A jail is about the saddest place anyone can be in, a hopeless place."

After miraculously surviving the war, he made his way to join his brother Eddi in Montreal.

They were the only members of their immediate family to survive. Morris went on to study at McGill University and forged a career as an internationally renowned soil scientist.

Perhaps most remarkable is that he maintained not only hope and physical courage, but emerged from unspeakable horror with even his spirit and sense of humour intact.

With a twinkle in his eye, he concluded his remarks at the SJCC by saying: "I am sure you are exhausted already listening to me. Just imagine how exhausted I was living through it."

"It was very interesting times, but I don't recommend it to anybody."

CORRECTION

In the article "The Pianist leaves audience breathless" (CJN, Dec. 19), Peter Jassem, president of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, was quoted as saying, "It shows bad Poles, good Poles, bad Nazis and good Nazis." Jassem was in fact referring to a quote from director Roman Polanski, who said, "There were good Poles and bad Poles. The same goes with the Jews, the same with the Germans. They are simply human." The CJN regrets the error.

Grandparents seen as key resource for continuity

BY PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Jewish grandparents represent the greatest untapped resource for influencing the lives and values of their grandchildren, says Marlene Myerson, Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) regional educator for the Canadian Council of Reform Judaism.

"Jewish grandparents can become the creators of Jewish memories, memories so precious that they will help define who our grandchildren are, who they become and how they live their lives," said Myerson, a Toronto specialist in Jewish family education, during a Lunch and Learn lecture at Temple Anshe Sholom.

"Jewish grandparents have a responsibility to transmit their Jewish values from one generation to another. Jewish grandparents hold in their hands the power to make Judaism a precious legacy for their grandchildren."

Myerson acknowledged that some grandparents are walking a "tightrope" because their desire to influence their grandchildren might be in conflict with the parents' wishes.

"It's important to be sensitive to our married children and to respect their roles as parents. As well-intentioned as we might be, we need to exercise great self-control and we need to draw on our skilled diplomacy. Often a word given with the best of intentions can be so resented."

Referring to a World Jewish Congress survey released in September 2000, Myerson said it is predicted that the current number of Diaspora Jews, estimated at 8.6 million, will decline by 50 per cent within a generation. The overriding reason for this is intermarriage.

Though most statistics on intermarriage are based on American surveys claiming the rate of intermarriage to be 50 per cent or higher, it is likely that the rate in Canada is about 30 per cent, Myerson said.

Surveys suggest that if one partner in a marriage is Jewish, only about 25 per cent of their children will be raised as Jews.

"Statistics serve as a warning that these are worrisome times in our community."

Even if one parent is non-Jewish, grandparents can help maintain the Jewish identity of their grandchildren by exposing them to positive Jewish experiences, Myerson said.

"We can share the lessons that we have learned during our lifetime. Our memories, our tales of times past, our seasoned view of the world are priceless gifts which only grandparents can offer to their grandchildren."

Myerson suggested a number of ways grandparents can have an impact on their grandchildren.

"Write your memoirs. Take the time to write about your personal Jewish experiences, connections and values."

She also suggested that grandparents write an ethical will calling attention to specific Jewish values that may be passed on from one generation to the next.

She pointed out the importance of exploring Jewish family history through researching the family genealogy. Older grandchildren who are knowledgeable about the Internet can help with the project.

Buy grandchildren Jewish gifts prior to major Jewish holidays, Myerson said. Jewish gifts such as books, CDs and videos are a subtle way of reinforcing things we value.

"Make the celebration of Shabbat a regular occurrence in your home. Lighting the candles, blessing the wine and blessing the challah as a family [will be] a shared Jewish memory that the children will treasure."

Myerson said she purposely bakes challah late Friday afternoon so the house is filled with the smell of warm bread when the family sits down for dinner. "The grandchildren shriek with delight when the challah cover is lifted, the steam is still rising. I know they will never forget that feeling, that taste. That's why I do it."

She also emphasized the importance of inviting the family for dinner on Jewish holidays and of taking the grandchildren to synagogue whenever possible.

Encourage your children to send the grandchildren to Jewish nursery schools and camps, she said. "These experiences have a profound effect on Jewish identity."

Helen Sharpe, 70, makes aliyah

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Helen Meyers Sharpe did not know the first time she volunteered to serve on an Israeli army base in the Volunteers for Israel: Sarel program that the experience would ultimately lead her to make aliyah.

After eight stints with Sarel, where non-Israelis do the work of reservists on army bases throughout Israel, Meyers Sharpe, 70, an ebullient, retired lawyer is leaving family and friends behind to fulfil the dream she has had since childhood.

Helen Myers Sharpe

"While I worked at that first army base in 1986, I met wonderful Israelis and I wanted to move there then. But with my work and my children, it wasn't practical at that time. And each time I returned, I made more lasting friendships and became more committed to the country."

Meyers Sharpe has two sons, Steven, a lawyer turned business executive, and Mark, who is in marketing, and five grandchildren. They all live in Toronto.

With Sarel, the energetic grandmother has painted curbs, cleaned oil barrels, gardened and worked on tanks.

She was on an army base during the Gulf War. "The scuds were falling all around us and we spent time in our sealed room with gas masks.

"Over the years, I virtually went from one base to the next, but I was happy as a lark because I felt that I was making a contribution to Israel. I wanted to be there to show my support for the Israeli people who were then, as today, feeling isolated."

Meyers Sharpe was born in Toronto. Her parents, who were ardent Zionists, owned Meyers Cigar Store on Bloor Street at Spadina Avenue. They later bought the Belmont Hotel in Brantford, where they lived for several years before returning to Toronto.

After her marriage in 1952, Meyers Sharpe moved to Windsor, where she was active in the community and served as president of Hadassah-WIZO of Windsor and was involved with Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue.

She took part-time courses at the University of Windsor and received a BA in psychology. After a divorce in 1976, at the age of 45, she entered law school and articled with Gignac, Sutts in Windsor where she later practised civil litigation and family law.

She was called to the bar in Toronto in 1982, and in 1986, she decided to move to Toronto where her sons had settled. She worked at Gowling Strathy & Henderson and chose to practise labour law and family law on a contract basis. This allowed her to take off the summers to volunteer at Sarel. She retired from the practice of law in 1998.

After her decision to make aliyah, many people asked her if she was concerned about living in Israel. But, she says, "There is no place in the world today where your safety is guaranteed. When I was in Israel last summer, there was a huge concert by the Israeli Philharmonic at the Machane Yehuda Market in Jerusalem and thousands of people of all ages were there.

"This shows the indomitable spirit of the Israelis who will not hide under the bed. They come out, they work and they go to cafes and restaurants. And tourists and visitors are made to feel so welcome."

She adds that there is tight security wherever you go whether it is for a coffee or shopping in a supermarket. "This makes us feel very secure."

Meyers Sharpe will be living in Katamon, where she will go into an intense ulpan program for five months. "I hope to continue my volunteer work, join some study groups and hopefully find some part time work."

She believes that "it is incumbent upon every Jewish person to make a trip to Israel whether it is for four days or four weeks, because if we don't have Israel, we have no security anywhere in the world."

She notes that her family is supportive of her decision to make aliyah. "I know I am building bridges for my family and friends who have already told me that they are making plans to visit me. I feel I am opening doors."

Mutation linked to inherited colorectal cancer: study

MONTREAL — An international study initiated by a group of scientists and physicians at Montreal's Sir Mortimer B. Davis Jewish General Hospital has discovered a so-called founder mutation that is a cause of inherited colorectal cancer in Ashkenazi Jews.

"Although this mutation is rare, it is also highly likely to cause cancer in those families who carry it," explained Dr. William Foulkes, director of the McGill University faculty of medicine's program in cancer genetics and the study's lead author.

Published in the December 2002 issue of the American Journal of Human Genetics, the study was conducted by Foulkes, Dr. George Chong of the molecular diagnostic unit of the hospital's division of medical biochemistry, Dr. Elizabeth MacNamara, chief of the department of diagnostic medicine and Dr. Philip Gordon, chief of the division of colorectal surgery, along with researchers from hospitals in the United States, Europe, Israel and Australia.

A founder mutation is a disease-causing change in a gene in the egg or sperm of one person – the disease's founder, in effect – who passes it on to his or her children. Each child receives one copy of the gene, which is then passed down to about half of his or her children.

In successive generations, the gene makes its way along different branches of a family tree and eventually people who carry it marry and reproduce.

The phenomenon occurs frequently in populations that are geographically isolated or who tend to intermarry for religious or cultural reasons.

The founder mutation discovered in the new study, known as A636P, is in a gene called MSH2, a DNA repair gene. It was first identified in a family initially evaluated by Gordon at the Jewish General Hospital five years ago.

To determine whether this mutation existed in other Ashkenazi Jewish families worldwide, researchers tested more than 2,000 individuals in Europe, North America, Israel and Australia – some with a history of colon or endometrial cancer and others without striking family histories of cancer.

Results showed that people with a family history of colorectal or endometrial cancer were more likely to carry the mutation than those without a family history and those with colorectal cancer who carried the mutation were, on average, younger.

This particular mutation accounted for two to three per cent of colorectal cancer cases among Ashkenazi Jews whose age at diagnosis was under 60.

"This [research]... began with a single family and evolved into an important contribution to medical understanding of inherited colon cancer," Foulkes said.

Cancer of the colon and rectum is the second most common cause of death from malignancy. The lifetime probability of a person born in Canada developing colon and rectal cancer is 6.3 per cent in men and 6.5 per cent in women, while the probability of dying from the disease is about three per cent.

"When diagnosed at the appropriate time, many cases of colorectal cancer can be cured by surgery," Gordon said.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I buy whole wheat bread, but am wondering how to tell which breads are most nutritious and are really whole wheat.

A. This is an excellent question. Many whole wheat breads are actually made with white flour and do not have very much fibre. Look at or ask for ingredient lists and buy breads that contain whole wheat flour, not just enriched flour or enriched wheat flour.

Q. I have been using more olive oil because I know it is a healthy oil, but I am confused about which ones to buy. Some say light, some don't. Which should I choose.

A. Don't be fooled by oils claiming to be light. This simply means that they are light in weight, colour or flavour, not fat and calories. All oil (olive or other) contains 14 g of fat and 120 calories per tablespoon. Extra virgin olive oil simply tastes better due to its refining process.

Q. I have been told to reduce the amount of juice I drink because it is high in sugar and calories. Can I drink juices that say "no added sugar"?

A. Juices that say "no added sugar" may have less sugar and fewer calories than regular juice, but all juice (except diet drinks) still have significant calories and sugar, so it's probably best to reduce your consumption as much as possible.

Q. I have been told that my cholesterol is high, but I am having a very hard time eliminating salty, crunchy snacks. I see that many brands of chips are labelled cholesterol free. Are these OK? I don't have a weight problem.

A. Be very careful with these misleading claims. First, it is not the cholesterol in food but the fat in food that increases your LDL (bad) cholesterol; so potato chips claiming to be cholesterol free are still not your friend if your bad cholesterol is elevated. If you crave crunchy, salty snacks and don't need to lose weight, I would choose almonds as your snack of choice (10-12 is a serving). They are a good source of omega 3, calcium, fibre, protein and heart-healthy monounsaturated fat. Just make sure you stick to a serving, as they are high in calories and fat – but much healthier than chips.

Jewish women find comfort in virtual community

A Web site designed to serve as a virtual community for Jewish women experiencing infertility and pregnancy loss was recently launched.

TefilatChana.com has been in use by a targeted audience since July of this year but due to its success, organizers have decided to announce its availability to the greater Jewish public.

TefilatChana.com was organized and sponsored by an observant Jewish woman troubled by the lack of community support for couples struggling with the challenges of infertility and pregnancy loss.

The site provides online message boards where women can post questions, express emotions and share ideas in an anonymous forum.

Visitors to the site need not provide a name in order to participate; there is no fee for membership and no advertising on the pages.

TefilatChana.com aims to provide a sense of community for women who may feel alone and unable to relate to friends, neighbours, and relatives with growing families.

"It is a struggle shared by many in silence," said TefilatChana.com organizer, who uses the name 'Lee' on the site.

"Around the world, 15-20 per cent of couples experience infertility and pregnancy loss. But in the Jewish community, which places tremendous focus on family, the worlds 'im yirtzeh hashem by you' can conjure a profound and unique pain. And many suffer humiliation, jealousy and fear in silence.

On the Tefilat Chana Web site, women are not identified as residents of a certain town or shul, rather they are members of a community where others can relate and where shame is replaced by support."

Already, TefilatChana.com has served more than 1,600 women from around the world, including United States, Canada, Australia, the United Kingdom, South Africa, Italy and Japan.

A community leader moderates the message boards but women ranging in level of religiosity, age and diagnosis support one another with stories, encouragement and advice.

In addition to the message boards, TefilatChana.com features an interactive article section where experts in Halachah, fertility, pregnancy and adoption post articles for members to read and respond to either on the site or via e-mail.

TefilatChana.com provides links to other sites as well as recommended reading for members. In 2003, organizers plan to provide live online chats on topics requested by members.

TefilatChana.com was created in memory of a baby who did not make it to this world, and to his parents who continue to struggle silently with the challenges of infertility.

Privacy is maintained for all members and in order to protect the privacy of online community, site organizers have maintained anonymity as well.

For more information or to speak with site organizers, please contact communityleader@tefilatchana.com.

Israel debates response to terror

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon is vowing to step up targeted killings of suspected Palestinian terrorists.

He made the comment following a terror attack last Friday night at a West Bank yeshiva, in which four students were killed and some 10 others wounded.

Ironically, his vow also came as Israeli and Palestinian officials began reviewing the latest draft of a U.S. "road map" for achieving peace in the region.

Speaking at Sunday's cabinet meeting, Sharon said he and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz had agreed to strike at terrorists, those who help them and those who send them.

Also speaking at the meeting, Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein criticized the targeted assassinations policy, saying it must only be used as a last resort when all other attempts to arrest wanted Palestinians have failed.

Israel's practice of targeted killings is not new, but Sharon's statements again threw a spotlight on the controversial policy.

In last Friday's attack, two Palestinian gunmen dressed in Israeli army uniforms and armed with rifles and hand grenades infiltrated the settlement of Otniel south of Hebron.

They entered the yeshiva through the kitchen, firing on students and guests who had gathered for Shabbat dinner.

One of the students on kitchen duty managed to lock the door leading from the kitchen to the dining room, preventing the terrorists from entering the dining room.

All four of the students who were in the kitchen were killed.

One gunman was killed in a half-hour shootout with Israeli troops. The second terrorist fled but was later found and killed by Israeli soldiers.

On Sunday, the four Israelis killed in the attack were buried. They were identified as Pvt. Yehuda Bamberger, 20, of Karnei Shomron; Zvi Zieman, 18, of Re'ut; Gavriel Hoter, 17, from Alonei Habashan; and Staff-Sgt. Noam Apter, 23, of Shilo.

Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the attack, saying it came in retaliation for the slaying a day earlier of one of its leaders in the Jenin area.

In another development, an Israeli undercover unit arrested three members of Islamic Jihad near Hebron on Sunday, Army Radio reported.

Mofaz said Sunday that soldiers have arrested more than 1,200 Palestinians in the past two months in what he described as an unprecedented campaign against suspected terrorists.

Last Friday, the leader of Hamas called for additional attacks against Israel. During a rally of 30,000 supporters in Gaza City, Hamas founder Sheik Ahmed Yassin said discussions between Hamas and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement about temporarily suspending attacks on Israeli civilians will not prove fruitful.

> 'The first stage of the road map calls for both sides to call for an end to violence and commit to stopping incitement'

"The march of martyrs will move forward," Yassin said. Activists at the rally blew up a model of an Israeli tank and burned U.S., British and Israeli flags.

Israel blamed Arafat for the Otniel attack, saying the Palestinian Authority has failed to clamp down on terror.

A Palestinian official said Israel's policies, including the targeted killings, were to blame for the ongoing attacks.

Meanwhile, Israeli and Palestinian officials began reviewing the latest draft of an international diplomatic initiative aimed at ending more than two years of violence.

The draft of the road map was given to the two sides after President George W. Bush met in Washington earlier this month with other members of the so-called diplomatic Quartet – Russia, the European Union and the United Nations.

Israel persuaded Bush to agree not to publish the draft until after Israeli elections are held Jan. 28.

In the meantime, each side was expected to review the draft and draw up responses.

According to the Jerusalem Post, which published details of the road map on Sunday, there were few changes in the new draft.

According to the Post, the first stage of the road map calls for both sides to call for an end to violence and commit to stopping incitement. It also calls for a complete freeze on Israeli settlement activity for visible steps by the Palestinians to fight terror. The Palestinian Authority is called on to undertake political and security reforms.

The second stage begins with Palestinian elections and concludes at the end of 2003 with the establishment of a Palestinian state with provisional borders. It also calls for an international conference convened by the Quartet.

The third stage, lasting until the end of 2005, calls for a second international conference that would include final-status talks on borders, refugees, settlements and Jerusalem, the Jerusalem Post reported.

Political sources in Jerusalem were reportedly satisfied with the latest version, Israel Radio reported Sunday. Though Israel has begun drawing up its response, it is not expected to be submitted until after the elections, the report said.

Court rejects petition of reservists refusing to serve in territories

By MOSHE GORALI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The High Court of Justice on Monday rejected the petition of eight IDF reserve soldiers and officers who refuse to serve in the West Bank and Gaza for reasons of conscience.

A panel of three justices – Aharon Barak, Dorit Beinisch and Ayala Procaccia – ruled that selective conscientious objection cannot be recognized because "it would weaken the ties that bind us as a nation."

The ruling argued, "Yesterday there was opposition to serving in Lebanon. Today the opposition is to serving in Yehuda and Shomron [the West Bank] and tomorrow there will be opposition to evacuating settlement outposts."

The justices warned that "the people's army is liable to turn into an army in which every unit acts according to its own particular conscience."

The eight petitioners are members of Courage to Refuse, a group of reserve soldiers who refuse to serve in the West Bank and Gaza. They are not classic conscientious objectors, as they are willing to serve inside Israel.

Founded in January, the group has since grown to 512 members. The signatories have vowed they will "not continue to fight beyond the 1967 borders in order to dominate, expel, starve and humiliate an entire people."

With the decision, petitioner First Lieut. David Zonsheine will return to jail for three weeks.

To return to jail "is the best and most important duty a soldier in the army can perform today for Israel," Zonsheine said after the ruling. "Our refusal to serve in the occupied territories is the most Jewish and Zionistic ideal that can be upheld in this situation."

The petitioners were seeking the court's backing for their view that refusal to serve in the West Bank and Gaza is legitimate because the occupation and Israel Defence Forces activities there are illegal. The appeal was submitted after IDF Judge Advocate General Menahem Finkelstein refused to accept this argument and to cancel the indictments for refusing to carry out orders.

The petition's main argument is that the occupation has become illegal during the past two years and, therefore, orders aimed at supporting and continuing it should not be obeyed.

According to this argument, the occupation has led to "a system which consists entirely of collective punishment of a civilian population that today numbers over three million people – children, women and men; the State of Israel and the IDF have in recent years entirely absolved themselves of their duty, according to international law and Israeli constitutional law, to take care of the population occupied by them."

New head of Yeshiva University faces new challenges

By JOE BERKOFSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — When students from Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life confronted Hillel's president and international director during the recent United Jewish Communities General Assembly, his reaction was "warm and engaging," according to a longtime colleague.

The students peppered Richard Joel with criticism that events during the United Jewish Communities' annual gathering had condescended to them.

Joel – who had delivered speeches, participated in panels and spent days working the summit halls – listened intently. He expressed sympathy for the students and asked them how they would have done things differently.

For Neil Moss, chair of Hillel's board of directors and a longtime colleague, Joel's reaction was typical for a corporate chief who also plays accordion, dances and sings into the wee hours at summer Hillel retreats.

"Sometimes I joke with him that he's an overgrown camp counsellor," Moss says. "He's the guy who loses his voice."

Joel's voice will now resonate in a much wider arena: On Dec. 5, Joel, 52, was named president of Yeshiva University, the flagship institution of modern Orthodoxy.

His mission, Joel says, will be "to move along an institution whose job is to inspire and educate and give opportunities to a generation of young people, who will in fact lead Orthodoxy and Jewish life and the world at a time when there is a darkness of values."

He will make the transition from Hillel to YU by spring 2003, Joel says.

Joel's election capped a controversial two-year search that reflected the debate over whether to allow someone other than a Torah scholar to head the world's largest Orthodox university.

For the first time in its 116 years, YU officials named neither a rabbi nor a Torah scholar, but a charismatic, popular modern Orthodox figure widely regarded for his management and fundraising skills.

"I think he'll take an excellent institution and take it to all kinds of places we haven't dreamed about," says Barry Shrage, president of the Combined Jewish Philanthropies of Greater Boston.

A former New York assistant district attorney who was once dean of the Cardozo School of Law, Joel is married and has six children. He has a daughter at YU's Stern College for Women and a son at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, or RIETS.

"With real humility, I've accepted the presidency of YU," he says. "No one has offered me the leadership of the Orthodox world."

He adds it's noteworthy that he was elected during Chanukah, as his new role is also "about the kindling of lights."

Many who have worked with Joel say they're confident he'll succeed.

In part, they point to Joel's 14-year track record at Hillel: he took an organization of campus religious chapters loosely tied to B'nai B'rith and on the brink of financial collapse and transformed it into a high-profile, well-funded, corporate-style entity through his sheer magnetism, they say.

Lynn Schusterman, president of the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Foundation, calls Joel a "pied piper," while many cite his charisma in the near-reverent tones groupies reserve for rock stars.

"He has a vision for Jewish life that is very deep and compelling and profound," says Rabbi Jim Diamond, director of the Center for Jewish Life at Princeton University and of the Princeton Hillel.

Richard Joel

"He is the total package. He has extraordinary ability in all areas – vision, speaking, people skills, management skills, creativity," adds Jay Rubin, Hillel's executive vice president.

Joel's rhetorical abilities are well-known. Nathan Diament, director of the Orthodox Union's Institute for Public Affairs, says Joel "realizes the power of language in conveying ideas, in motivating people and institutions."

Still, some say the key is Joel's ability to marry lofty words to real strategies.

"What he has is a real vision that he can articulate and bring to life," Shrage says. "People know he's for real."

Joel is also a workhorse, many say. Seth Goldstein, a New York University law school student who worked as an aide to Joel for a year, says, "He's nonstop; he never says no. His days start at 6:30 a.m. and go to 2:30 a.m. I would leave him at 1:15 a.m. and he'd still be going."

Joel served as chair of an OU commission that investigated into the sexual harassment case of Rabbi Baruch Lanner. In December 2000, the panel released part of a scathing 332-page report blaming OU leaders for ignoring reports of Lanner's abuse and urging major organizational reforms.

He also helped found a modern Orthodox congregation, Kemp Mill Synagogue, in his home city of Silver Spring, Md., that today includes 250 families.

At Hillel, Joel applied the kind of power-sharing leadership techniques that management gurus advocate. Colleagues speak of having "autonomy" and being allowed to "take ownership" of their work.

He also set the bar high.

"One of Richard's hallmarks was to say, 'We've done this – now what?'" Rubin says. "He strives for excellence."

"Now what?" is a good question.

The search for a new YU head was so fraught with tension that it was only in the two days preceding the Dec. 5 vote that the boards of trustees for the university and RIETS appeared ready to back Joel.

Even then, it came only after Joel met face-to-face and at length with the trustees.

In the end, YU officials made an arrangement some called surprising: Joel was named president of YU and chief executive officer of RIETS, while YU's outgoing president Norman Lamm, a highly regarded Torah scholar, will become rosh yeshiva, or head of RIETS, and university chancellor.

A top-ranked university with five locations in New York – including RIETS, medical and law schools, affiliated health-care centres and high schools – YU remains committed to its program of Jewish and general studies, says Julius Berman, president of the RIETS board.

In light of its "complex" character, Berman says, YU "requires that much more leadership," adding that Joel has vowed to encourage "a more integral relationship" between the university's different segments.

Exactly how YU's new power structure will develop remains to be seen. But those who know Joel say he embodies what YU is about, and is deeply committed to its success.

Diamond, of Princeton, predicts Joel will "do great things" for YU.

"He moves very fast, he has a clear idea of what he wants and doesn't want, and he can be very tough," Diamond says. "But I think that's going to help him… To be a university president, you have to be tough."

Vatican opens archives

By RUTH E.GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — The Vatican is about to open up secret archives that document its relations with Nazi Germany before World War II.

But it may be years before a full picture of the Vatican's role in the Holocaust is known.

Responding to criticism that the wartime pope, Pius XII, did not do enough to oppose the Holocaust, the Vatican announced last Saturday that on Feb. 15 it would release diplomatic documents from the tenure of the previous pope, Pius XI, who reigned from 1922 to 1939.

During those years, the future Pope Pius XII served as the Vatican's ambassador in Berlin and the Vatican's secretary of state.

The documents to be released include material from the Vatican diplomatic missions in Berlin and Munich, as well as a series of documents relating to the rise of Nazism and the "condemnation of racism," papal spokesperson Joaquin Navarro-Valls said in a statement.

Of these documents, he said, the Berlin diplomatic archive dating from 1931 to 1934 was "nearly completely destroyed or dispersed" during the 1945 bombing of Berlin and a fire at the apostolic nuncio's palace.

Brown University scholar David Kertzer, author of the recent book The Popes Against the Jews, welcomed the release of the material, but said it will only provide part of the picture.

"What they are doing is opening certain parts of the material relating to Pius XI, just the archives dealing with the Holy See and Germany," Kertzer said.

"But a lot of what was going on in the rest of Europe we won't know. Will they be opening the rest of the archives in stages or will we have to wait another two years to see anything more?" he said.

"It's a good thing that they will be opened, but until all the rest of the documents relating to Pius XI are available, it will be hard to put them in context."

The Vatican announced last February that it would begin opening archives relating to Pius XII, starting with the prewar years.

Documents relating to Vatican-German relations during the Pius XII papacy itself will be made available only starting in 2005.

Pius XII became pope in 1939 and reigned until his death in 1958. Critics have long accused him of turning a blind eye to the Holocaust and allowing Jews to die because of his silence.

Scholars and particularly Jewish groups have long called for the secret archives to be opened to clarify the matter, particularly as a process to beatify Pius XII is under way.

The issue has clouded Jewish-Vatican relations.

A joint Catholic-Jewish team of scholars set up to study already published wartime Vatican archives collapsed last year amid angry recriminations, because it could not obtain access to all the archives.

Sharon: Cabinet must co-operate with police probe

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Speaking behind closed doors Sunday night, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon hinted he would fire Likud MK and deputy minister Naomi Blumenthal if it emerged she had refused to answer police questions over alleged corruption in the Likud primary.

"I expect that anyone who doesn't give such an explanation or reserves the right to remain silent will immediately quit the party's list," Sharon said.

Sources close to Sharon said if Blumenthal did remain silent during police questioning, he would take all the necessary steps against her. One source said Sharon would not hesitate to relieve her of her ministerial position.

Dov Weisglass, head of the prime minister's office, has been asked to look into whether or not Blumenthal co-operated with investigators during questioning. Earlier Sunday, Weisglass sent an urgent letter to Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein about Blumenthal's alleged silence on how she succeeded in being elected to the number 9 position on the Likud's candidate list for the Jan. 28 Knesset elections.

Referring to Blumenthal, Sharon also said any Likud member who could not explain how he or she was elected to the Likud list must be ousted from the party.

Blumenthal aide Michal Kami said the deputy minister is shocked Sharon has "turned her into a scapegoat" without even talking to her.

Police questioned Blumenthal in Jerusalem on Sunday about her role in alleged irregularities in the Likud primaries. Blumenthal exercised her right to remain silent and refused to answer investigators' questions.

As early as the end of last week, Blumenthal appeared to be refusing to cooperate with the police probe, and officers feared that she was interfering with their investigation.

Fraud squad detectives tried various methods last week to summon Blumenthal for questioning, but she did not answer her phone for several hours. Blumenthal is suspected of funding part of the cost of providing luxury hotel rooms for Likud Central Committee members. Last Friday morning, police managed to contact Blumenthal for the first time, but she told them she was unwell and could not come in for questioning.

Police will question Sharon's son Omri on allegations of vote-buying during the vote for Likud central committee. According to investigation material and testimonies, Omri had ties with figures on whom the police have gathered a large quantity of material recently, including ex-convict Shlomi Oz, whom Omri has admitted to knowing.

Al Qaeda joins anti-Israel battle

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

By virtue of its twin attacks on Israelis in Kenya last November, Al Qaeda has served notice of its future intentions. As 2003 dawns, Israel faces the bleak reality that a new, fiercely motivated enemy has Israelis in its cross hairs. The events of Nov. 28, 2002 in Mombasa mark a watershed in Israel's struggle for survival.

On that dark day, Al Qaeda – the loosely-knit, international, Islamic fundamentalist terrorist network led by Osama bin Laden – killed three Israelis and 10 Kenyans in a suicide bombing at the Paradise Hotel and, 20 minutes before, almost succeeded in downing an Arkia Airlines jet, with 261 passengers, taking off from Mombasa's airport.

A much greater tragedy would have occurred had the terrorists struck the hotel a little earlier, when many more Israelis were in the lobby, and had the shoulder-fired missiles hit their target. "The attacks should be judged by their intention, not their results," Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz commented.

It is clear that Al Qaeda, which had previously confined its anti-Israel venom to the verbal arena, has committed itself to fighting Israel tangibly. Al Qaeda's headlong plunge into the Arab-Israeli dispute will have three ramifications.

- It will expose Israel and its citizens, and possibly Jews in the Diaspora, to further violence.
- It will stretch Israel's anti-terrorist resources, already strained by the second Palestinian uprising.
- It heralds Israel's full-blown entry into the global war against terrorism – which, as Israeli Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has observed, affords Israel an opportunity to strengthen its relations with the United States, its chief ally, and other countries with a direct stake in containing this phenomenon.

Al Qaeda's decision to join forces with the likes of Hamas and Islamic Jihad is not really surprising. Al Qaeda, having encountered difficulties in hitting new American targets since Sept. 11, 2001, has begun focusing on Israel as well.

For Al Qaeda, Israel is a natural foe. Israel is closely aligned with the United States, Al Qaeda's main ideological adversary. And Israel itself is regarded by Islamic radicals as an illegitimate state to be eradicated.

Last autumn, Israel foiled an Al Qaeda plot to attack its national soccer team in Malta. Last year, Al Qaeda allegedly tried to shoot down an airplane carrying Shimon Peres, Israel's then-foreign minister.

Several days prior to last November's attacks in Mombasa, bin Laden issued a statement over the Internet, titled Letter to the American People, in which he claimed, for the first time, that Israel's existence is the main reason Al Qaeda has declared war on the United States. As he put it: "The creation and continuation of Israel is one of the greatest crimes, and you [the Americans] are the leaders of its criminals." In closing, he said Israel "must be erased."

In another statement on Dec. 3, Al Qaeda said that Israel's "sins" against the Palestinians "will not go unpunished." On Dec. 6, Al Qaeda, announcing the formation of the Islamic Al Qaeda Organization in Palestine, said its objective is to "defeat the Zionist Jewish invaders and return them to the place... whence they came."

On Dec. 8, Al Qaeda belatedly confirmed its responsibility for the Kenyan attacks. To Israel, the confirmation was stale news, since these terrorist operations had all the hallmarks of an Al Qaeda strike. They were co-ordinated, sophisticated and designed to exact a high death toll. In addition, the two Russian missile launchers Kenyan authorities recovered were from the same production batch used by an Al Qaeda operative last May to try to shoot down a U.S. military plane in Saudi Arabia.

Al Qaeda has been plotting against Israel for some time now. In 2000, Israel arrested Nabil Okal, an Al Qaeda activist, at a Gaza border crossing. Last year, Jordan intercepted Al Qaeda terrorists trying to cross into Israel. Last month, Israel deported to Jordan a Palestinian American charged with being an Al Qaeda agent. Most recently, Israel suggested that Al Qaeda has set up networks in the Gaza Strip and southern Lebanon.

Cabinet extends special benefits for Argentine immigrants

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israeli cabinet on Sunday authorized an extension through 2003 of the special benefits for Argentine immigrants.

Immigration from Argentina has increased sharply over the past year in the wake of the economic crisis there. Immigrants from Argentina receive a supplementary benefit as well as mortgage and employment assistance in addition to the absorption basket received by all new immigrants.

Uncertainty about whether the extra benefits for Argentine immigrants would be extended beyond the end of the year caused a sharp increase in immigration recently, with some 1,500 immigrants arriving in December alone.

For the first time since 1989, the number of immigrants from countries other than those in the former Soviet Union almost equalled the number of immigrants from the FSU, according to figures for 2002 released recently by the Absorption Ministry.

From 1990 until 2002, the number of immigrants from the FSU made up more than 80 per cent of the total, but in 2002 the percentage of immigrants from the FSU fell to 54 per cent as the result of a decline in immigration from there and an increase in those arriving from France and Argentina.

The number of immigrants who have arrived in Israel since the beginning of the large wave of immigration in 1989 now stands at 1,132,708.

Some 83 per cent of new immigrants of draft age serve in the Israel Defence Forces, and some 40 per cent receive some form of financial assistance during their military service.

One in four combat soldiers is a new immigrant and new immigrants make up 27 per cent of the Paratroop brigade, which is a volunteer outfit.

Deputy Absorption Minister Yuli Edelstein said the number of new immigrants who are school dropouts stood at 22 per cent, higher than the percentage of immigrants in the population, and the percentage of immigrants in military jails was too high, claiming many went absent without leave in order to help their families' finances.

Imaginative Max is a dull, static vehicle

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

John Cusack as Max Rothman

Menno Meyjes lets his imagination run riot in Max, which is scheduled to open later this month at the Cineplex chain.

The scenario he sketches in this flimsy film calls upon viewers to suspend belief and imagine a situation in which Adolf Hitler, a newly demobilized soldier, strikes up an unusual acquaintanship with an amiable Munich-based Jewish art dealer named Max Rothman.

Hitler, as you may know, was an aspiring artist before he was consumed by politics. Not much of a painter, he channelled all his energies into poisonous rants blaming Jews for all of Germany's ailments and problems.

The story that unfolds in Max starts in 1918, just months before a prostrate Germany is forced to submit to the draconian Treaty of Versailles.

First glimpsed in a bread line for returning soldiers, Hitler (Noah Taylor) is portrayed as a ne'er-do-well, without a fixed address or profession, who is convinced of his greatness.

"Corporal Hitler," as Rothman (John Cusack) politely addresses him, hates abstract art and holds that anti-Semitism should be based on facts rather than emotions. "The Jewish question," he pontificates, "should be left to the state, like public health and sewage."

Meyjes would have us believe that Hitler, at this point, is not yet a full-fledged anti-Semite, and, like Rothman, is open to everything.

Despite Hitler's scruffy appearance and suffocatingly intense demeanour, Rothman is strangely drawn to him, and encourages Hitler to find " his authentic voice" on canvas. Rothman, a war vet who lost an arm in battle, empathizes with Hitler's artistic yearnings.

Meyjes throws several other characters into the mix – Nina (Canadian actress Molly Parker, who proves ineffective in this fluffy role), Rothman's sensitive wife who tolerates his affair with Liselore von Peltz (Leelee Sobieski), and Mayr (Ulrich Thomsen), a captain in the German army who steers Hitler toward the concept of blood purity, conspiracy theories and the new Nazi party.

Apart from Rothman, whom Cusack plays with world-weary gravity, the centre of attention in Max is Hitler. Taylor's nervous, jumpy portrayal is too frenetic by half, with the result that Hitler seems like a caricature of himself.

That Taylor is cast as Hitler is deliciously ironic. In one of his last films, Shine, Taylor played a tormented Jewish pianist and son of a Holocaust survivor. And now this!

Aside from Taylor's over-the-top performance, I was troubled by the director's tendency to invest Hitler's views about Jews with a complexity that surely does not square with the facts. Artistic licence is one thing, but history is immutable.

For starters, Hitler insists that he is not an anti-Semite. This is quite a stretch, and hardly in accord with what is known about him. And then odd words roll out of Hitler's twisted mouth. He "admires" Jews because they are "very intelligent" and "guard the purity of their blood."

Rothman tries to persuade Hitler that " blood science" is kitsch and that his fascination with it will retard him as a budding artist.

To no avail, of course. Soon enough, under Mayr's baleful influence, Hitler lashes out at Jews, accusing them of contaminating German culture and morality and likening them to vampires. Blinded by hubris, Hitler proclaims that politics is "the new art."

Throughout Max, Hitler comes off as a thoroughly repulsive character. "You're an awfully hard man to like," Rothman blurts out. "He's the most horrible creature I've ever seen," complains Rothman's mistress.

Although Rothman's curious relationship with Hitler occasionally causes a frisson of excitement, Max itself is a dull, static vehicle.

Meyjes' attempt to find meaning and clarity in his construct of Hitler is understandable. But Max is definitely not the film that achieves this objective. A viewer would be better off reading a penetrating biography or watching a gripping documentary.

Film makes a strong political statement

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Divine Intervention, a polemical film by Israeli Arab director Elia Suleiman, is deceptively subversive.

Smouldering beneath its bland, random, sometimes absurdist exterior is pent-up anger.

And the rage is directed against Israel.

Divine Intervention, which had its debut at last year's Toronto International Film Festival and is scheduled to open in Toronto on Jan. 10, is set largely in Nazareth – Suleiman's hometown – but also in Jerusalem and the West Bank.

Almost devoid of dialogue, this fragmentary movie unfolds through a series of seemingly disconnected vignettes brimming with dark, sly humour.

A man dressed as Santa Claus runs up a slope as gifts tumble from his straw basket. A driver waves at friends and curses them under his breath. A man throws a plastic garbage bag into someone else's garden. A boy kicks around a soccer ball aimlessly.

What all these scenes are supposed to signify, aside from the state of the unpredictable human condition, is not entirely clear. Your interpretation, or guess, is as good as mine.

But having piqued his audience's curiosity, Suleiman, who appears in the film as a milquetoast character named ES, gets down to the business at hand: skewering Israel and promoting the Palestinian cause by indirect means.

As a car races past a residential building, the driver tosses out an apricot pit. It bounces off an Israeli tank, causing it to explode in a fireball.

Names in the News: Twenty-five-year-old singer-actor Shoshana Bean, who stars in the Broadway show Hairspray, is quickly becoming the talk of the town. Actress Shirley MacLaine recently visited the Portland, Ore., native backstage and told her, "You are a shining light on that stage. You're going to be a star!" – words that made it into the New York Times, along with a photograph of MacLaine and Bean together.

"Shoshana Bean explodes onstage in voice and verve like a fourth of July pyrotechnic extravaganza! This is a talent that will not be ignored!" said Hairspray cast mate, Harvey Fierstein.

On Jan. 6, Bean presents an intimate concert of standard and original songs at New York's Duplex Cabaret, and has another solo concert scheduled for the spring. We may be hearing more of this dynamic and gifted performer.

Divine Intervention makes a strong political statement

What is the message? It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure it out.

In another politically charged scene, a man lets loose a red balloon with a likeness of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat. It floats serenely over eastern Jerusalem.

Is Suleiman claiming that part of Jerusalem for the Palestinians? The answer: a resounding yes.

This is followed by a biting satire of an Israeli checkpoint in the West Bank and of Israeli soldiers chanting, "Am Yisrael Chai."

The boldest political statements are left for last.

Suleiman juxtaposes the lyrics on an Arabic cassette, "I can't stand it when you put me down," with a view of an Israeli Jew with a kippah. The implication is obvious.

Then, in bitter fashion, Suleiman pokes fun at a group of Israeli sharpshooters honing their skills at a shooting range.

As they fire at Arab cardboard figures, a beautiful Arab woman magically morphs into a fearsome Ninja warrior. Whirling furiously like a dervish, she shoots down an Israeli helicopter. Some of the metal shards from the wreckage are in the shape of a map of a would-be Palestinian state.

The subtext is that the Palestinians can only achieve their goals through violence.

The strongest point that Suleiman makes in Divine Intervention is that Palestinians are seething with frustration and anger at being denied freedom and statehood. This is illustrated, metaphorically, when a pressure cooker in a man's kitchen nears the boiling point.

Musician strives to keep Sephardi music alive

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Judith Cohen and her 16-year-old daughter, Tamar Ilana Cohen Adams, are two of a small number of musicians worldwide who perform and record old Judeo-Spanish songs, keeping the tradition of Sephardi music alive.

Tamar showed her vocal gifts early, singing on a track of one of Cohen's recordings at age five. The CD, Dans mon Chemin J'ai Rencontré/Along the Road I Met..., includes a Bosnian song, Dobro Doshli, lane moje, on which Cohen and Tamar, then 8, sing in lovely two-part harmony. Now, mother and daughter's voices blend beautifully, with Cohen bringing profound emotional depth.

Dans mon Chemin J'ai Rencontré/Along the Road I Met..., won the Radio Canada 1994 Maurice Blouin Prize.

Cohen and her daughter perform at Acoustic Harvest (416-264-2235) on Jan. 18, at a lecture/recital focusing on the Crypto-Jews of Portugal at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue (416-221-3433) on Feb. 11 and at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on March 6 (416-924-6211).

Along with Sephardi music, Cohen and Tamar perform medieval and traditional music, including Balkan, Portuguese, Yiddish and French Canadian. They sing either a cappella or with their own accompaniment of bowed vielle (medieval troubadour fiddle), oud (Middle Eastern lute) and/or traditional percussion instruments.

Cohen, who is associated with York University's music department, has been researching Sephardi music since 1980, and since 1996, she has also been researching music in the historically Crypto-Jewish areas along the border regions of Spain and Portugal. There, she interviews Crypto-Jews, Jews forced to adopt other religions and political philosophies while maintaining Jewish practices. She studies the role of music in their lives and in the context of the music of the regions they live in.

Crypto-Jews continued to secretly practise Judaism in Portugal, and to a lesser extent in Spain, after Jews were expelled in 1492 from Spain and in 1497 from Portugal.

"Village women who have met me before, and even sometimes have only heard of me, will sometimes call out, 'Here comes that crazy Canadian woman professor who has no ear and no husband, and carries an old knapsack, and loves our songs,'" she says, adding their description of her is not intended unkindly.

Tamar, who often travels with Cohen, says she finds her mother's field work tedious at times. Sometimes, though, she does understand what motivates her mother, which she expresses in an article she wrote about a 1999 trip to Spain. Written in the style teenagers use in their e-mails, it was published in the Canadian Folk Music Bulletin.

"What's the point of trying to preserve things from the past when there R much better things now, and 2 come? Obviously, that's not how others like my mother C things. I sometimes understand, though," Tamar wrote. "Like that time I started to do my own little interview w/an old lady (on the bus 2 Hervás). I stopped myself, shocked, but only too late. 4 I'd already begun. I then realized that I'd been doing exactly what I alwayz complain about my mom doing. Interviewing."

Along with her field work in Spain and Portugal, Cohen has interviewed and recorded the songs of Sephardim in Israel, Greece, Turkey, France and several North American cities.

The people she talks to, mainly elderly women, often say that young people aren't interested in learning the old songs, which have already skipped a generation. In the early 1980s, the women who knew complete versions of songs were about 75 years old, Cohen says.

Originally from Montreal, Cohen was introduced to Sephardi music in the early 1970s, when a Spanish friend she'd met while hitchhiking through Europe sent her a tape by Joaquín Díaz, one of the first Spanish singers to popularize Sephardi music.

Shortly afterward, while doing a master's degree in medieval Iberian women's music, Cohen began working in the field of Judeo-Spanish music, on the suggestion of the renowned Sephardi studies scholar Sam Armistead. At that time, traditional versions of Judeo-Spanish songs were almost inaccessible to the average listener.

The melodies of pre-exilic Sephardi songs have been lost – neither Jews nor Muslims wrote down their music – with the exception of a fragment of a 12th-century song that was found in a manuscript. A song of praise by Obadiah the Proselyte, it's recorded on Cohen and Tamar's latest CD, Songs of Sepharad.

Lyrical love songs, recreational and topical songs, and songs about emigration to Israel were added to the Sephardi repertoire in the countries of the former Ottoman Empire in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

"This whole new body of songs developed, which is what any tradition does if it isn't going to die," Cohen says.

A discography of Sephardi music can be found linked to Cohen's Web site, www.yorku.ca/judithc.

Pettle brothers collaborate again for Sunday Father

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Playwright Adam Pettle and his brother, actor and director Jordan Pettle, recently worked together in Therac 25 and Zaidie's Shoes.

Adam wrote and acted in Therac 25 along with Jordan, and he penned Zaidie's Shoes, in which his brother also starred.

Now, the brothers are working together once again on Adam's new play Sunday Father, a three-character play directed by David Storch that opens Jan. 9 for a limited run at the Berkeley Street Theatre.

"I started writing Sunday Father two years ago, it came out of a Canadian Stage workshop for writers," Adam says.

"Sunday Father is about two brothers, Jed and Alan. Jed is going through a separation from his wife Amy. Jed and Alan were from a divorced family, so it is their journey through another separation. The brothers are Jewish, the wife is not. I come from a divorced family, but the story is not my story, it is quite fictional," Adam explains.

Onstage, Jordan will be joined by Liisa Repo-Martell as Amy, and his good friend Ari Cohen will portray his brother Alan.

"Jed is a sports writer, married to a psychiatrist. He's a happy family man with a 4-year-old son Daniel. Huge problems emerge in his relationship. Jed has to deal with the fact that his marriage is breaking up and he is doing something to his kid that his father did to him. He and his brother explore what it means to be adults from a divorced childhood," says Jordan.

Adam said he wrote the character of Jed with his brother in mind, and both say they love working together.

"It is great to work with someone you love and trust. Jordan and I seem to jive off each other well. We have a kind of shorthand because we've known each other for so long," Adam says.

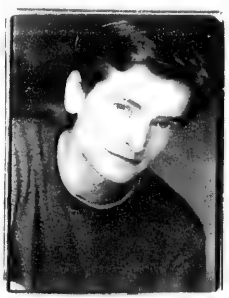
"I love my brother and it is a joy speaking my brother's words. Adam is a great playwright, his dialogue is actor friendly, the characters are very challenging, accessible, complex, filled with needs and wants – all the things that you look for as an actor," Jordan says.

"It also helps when you are working on a play and you have a question and you can call up your brother on his cell phone and get some answers. Last week, I called [Adam] several times a day to ask him about the play. If I were working on a play by a dead playwright, I wouldn't be able to do that."

Adam looks forward to watching his own work come alive on stage, but don't expect to see him sitting in the theatre on opening night.

Instead, you're more likely to find him in Jordan's dressing room, listening.

"I find it hard as a writer to watch on opening night. I have the same adrenaline and energy the actors have, yet I have to sit on it. It is tough and not fun for anyone sitting beside me. So I've decided the best for me is to be listening to it, but not watching it," Adam says.



Jordan Pettle

Other upcoming projects for Adam include writing a made-for-TV-movie called I.C.U. with producer Alana Franks for the CBC. He's also currently working on two more plays, one set in a bagel shop, the other he is co-writing for CanStage with Patrick Huard.

And in 2003, Zadie's Shoes will be produced by Alberta Theatre Projects in Calgary and the Arts Club Theatre in Vancouver.

Jordan has recently performed in Chasing Cain: Face and That Summer in Paris: Hemingway vs. Callaghan, both for CBC TV. He will also be seen in the upcoming movie The Devil's Throat, directed by Mike Figgis and starring Sharon Stone and Dennis Quaid.

Acting and directing were not Jordan's first choice of careers.

"I always wanted to be a baseball player, but that didn't work out because of my size, but I was a good shortstop," he says.

"I prefer acting [to directing], although there are things about directing I love, like being able to have a vision of the whole play and being responsible for the lights and the set. But I can't give up acting."

For tickets to Sunday Father, call 416-368-3110 or Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111, or visit www.canstage.com.

Kitchenware entrepeneur sells through clicks and bricks

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

What do you get when you combine your life's passion with your technological know-how?

If you are Howard Goldstein, you get Golda's Kitchen, a successful on-line site, www.goldaskitchen.com, that features specialty kitchenware.

Goldstein, 35, originally from Montreal, graduated from the University of Pennsylvania with a degree in computer science and engineering, and while he had worked for 11 years as an information systems consultant, he was looking for a new career direction. He had spent a lot of time travelling and found he just needed something else."

Always a "baker at heart," – he has "lovingly" prepared 35 different chocolate items for a party – he thought baking would be too labour intensive as a full-time career.

When visiting family in Montreal about three years ago, though, he was inspired by a high-end kitchenware shop.

"I was amazed at their product line. I had never seen anything like it in Toronto. I couldn't get over, for instance, the variety of baking pans in stock.

"I wondered, if I could not get these items in a city the size of Toronto, what about people in small communities across the country? Where do they get such specialty items?"

On the six-hour drive home, he and his partner Fred Pritchard, a Certified General Accountant, drew on their professional skills and decided that they had the expertise to run an Internet kitchenware site.

At the time, all the online stores were American, and would not ship items here. "We decided we could capitalize on this void in the market. We'd start up an all-Canadian on-line kitchen store, and we'd be the only site that was first and foremost Canadian," Goldstein says.

"The name of business was a given. First of all it was my university nickname, but we also wanted the name to sound like someone's grandmother. Grandmothers' cooking connotes all kinds of food memories. Our business would become a fusion of grandmother's kitchen and modern day utensils."

Golda's Kitchen started as a 1½-man show, Goldstein says, with Pritchard helping out with the business end. "I researched kitchenware products and designed the Web site from scratch, and in November 1999 we went live."

Working out of his home, Goldstein had his office upstairs and stored his product lines in the basement.

"I stocked what was popular at the time, such as spice tins, cake decorating supplies and piping tips, as well as food processors and mixers.

"We also tried to stock items that are not available in department stores, such as stainless steel appliances. We wanted to stand out from the average store, and I insisted that everything we stocked were things I would use in my own kitchen.

"We did some magazine ads and promoted ourselves on online search engines. People visited our site during that first holiday season, but it took time for sales to start trickling in. We were optimistic however, because we knew we were drawing visitors; people were becoming aware of us."

Soon, the pair began attending trade shows, and they had people sign up for an electronically delivered newsletter. "Traffic to our site increased, and people began buying, rather than just browsing. From year one to year two, we doubled our orders."

> 'One couple even came to our home from Niagara Falls in order to see the stock'

It was still however, a 1½-man operation. Pritchard had retained his full-time job as an accountant.

"Eventually, people began asking to see our products; one couple even came to our home from Niagara Falls in order to see the stock.

"After the 2000 holiday season in which we were up packing boxes until the wee hours of the morning, we knew we needed space, both for stock and for some staff. A store could act as the warehouse for the Internet stock. We also wanted our products displayed in a nicer environment."

As well, in the spring of 2001, the bottom began falling out of the technology market. The business needed an infusion of capital, Goldstein says.

Howard Goldstein

"We realized that in order for our business to grow, we needed help. The question was whether we wanted to get commercial space with a show room or jump right into retail," says Goldstein.

As residents of Mississauga, they knew that there were no high-end kitchen stores in the area, and suppliers agreed that it would be a good place to start up.

After a four-month search, they found space in a commercial/retail complex and opened a retail outlet on Sept. 6, 2001. "We're somewhat different from the typical online store. We've jumped from offering our wares exclusively by computer to opening up a bricks and mortar business.

"Sept. 11 certainly hurt our business. Not only was the store's grand opening affected, but people were watching CNN instead of shopping for kitchenware online," he says.

Sales picked up in October 2001, though, in both the retail and online business, and not only did Pritchard join the business full time, but they hired three part-time staff as well.

Since the store's opening they have experienced a lot of cross-over traffic, says Goldstein. "People browse around on-line and then they might drop into the store. Whatever we carry in the store, we carry online. Everything is identical – prices, and availability.

"The difference, however, is that we carry many out-of-season items online that might not be in the store at the time. Visitors to the site can find apple cutting machines, asparagus cookers and cherry pitters all year round."

For those who are hesitant about using their credit card online, Goldstein says shopping online may be more secure than shopping at any retail outlet.

"We store no credit card numbers; the number goes directly to the bank for authorization.

"Anyone living within the Windsor-Montreal corridor can receive their goods the next day, and those living in the area of Calgary, Edmonton or Vancouver can get about four-day service. As well, everything is returnable."

He has had customers in the Northwest Territories, Nunavut and the Yukon who have received their goods within six days, he says.

Goldstein says that revenues are currently split between the online business and the retail outlet, and although he and Pritchard believe sales at the retail outlet may eventually surpass those of the online operation, they will definitely keep up both ends of the business.

"We want all our customers, whether they are in Mississauga, Toronto or Red Deer, to be able to take advantage of our business. That can only be done online.

"Besides, shopping online is a win-win situation for everyone involved," he says.

"Customers can shop safely and securely at 11:00 p.m., and even though I work 75 to 80 hours a week, I can still conduct business while I'm sleeping."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP
President

Yiddish Humour: self-deprecating wit and sarcasm

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

What do a psychiatrist and a comedian have in common? In the case of Dr. Stan Freeman and his son Jonathan, it's Yiddish.

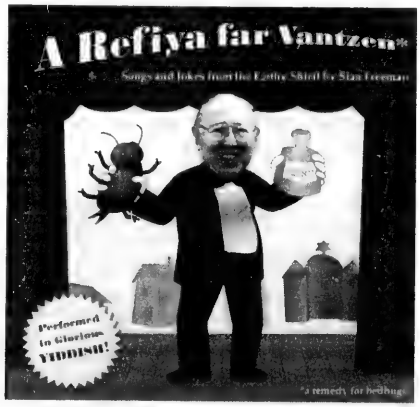
Freedman, a retired psychiatrist, recently produced a CD of Yiddish humour with his son, called A Refiya far Vantzen (A Remedy for Bedbugs).

But you don't have to have a good grasp of Yiddish to enjoy the stories, songs and jokes from the shtetl and from America. Particularly delightful are the children's street chants from the shtetl.

Freeman accumulated the material over many years, and he presents 14 selections in his easy to listen to CD. Many of the stories and jokes are not new, but they are a delight to hear over and over again.

He attended the Farband Jewish Folk Shule, the forerunner of Bialik Hebrew Day School. He went to Harbord Collegiate and graduated from medicine at the University of Toronto.

In 1968, he went to work at the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry, where he opened a department of social and community psychiatry. He worked there until his retirement seven years ago. He was also a professor of psychiatry at U of T.



A Refiya far Vantzen*
Songs and Jokes from the Earthy Shtetl by Stan Freeman
Performed in Glorious YIDDISH!
*a remedy for bedbugs

"I almost lost my Yiddish," he says. "But working with Holocaust survivors, with their compensation claims to the German government, and having my mother-in-law living with us who spoke in Yiddish poetry, my love of Yiddish grew."

Speaking of humour, he says there are different ways of reacting when you are down. "You can curse, but Jews traditionally lightened their situation with songs and self-mocking jokes."

The combination of pathos and humour, self-deprecating wit and sarcasm, adds flavour to the Yiddish language, he says.

He notes that Sholom Aleichem is a perfect example of self-mocking. "He said it is laughter through tears."

Freeman, who has three children and five grandchildren, says, "My mother Ida would sing Yiddish songs to me and my father Israel, a Yiddishist, taught me street chants and told me shtetl stories.

"Years ago, I had a secret fantasy of becoming a stand-up comic because I love Yiddish humour."

He cautions that the earthy aspects of A Refiya far Vantzen are part of Yiddish humour. For those of us who are lucky, it brings back memories of our parents and grandparents who spoke Yiddish and told stories of the Old Country.

"This CD is not for the delicate, the prudish or those who are offended if anything Jewish is lampooned," he warns. "It is mostly irreverent and occasionally, scatological and borderline obscene. Folk humor usually is.

"You cannot really know a people and love a people unless you also know its street language. The CD can be looked at as a piece of folklore, a socio-anthropological document, but it is funny."

He adds that "it was marvelous working with my son Jonathan, who sings harmony with me and plays the guitar and violin on the CD.

"And with computers, they make the whole thing miraculous. Within 10 minutes, we could create a synagogue choir."

For more information, visit the Freemans' Web site, http://homepage.mac.com/vitzen. The CD is available at Negev Importing Co., or you can order the CD from Jonathan Freeman at 416-536-6222 or by e-mail at yiddishhumor@aol.com.

Israeli tennis star Smashnova breaks million dollar prize barrier

By SIMON GRIVER
Israel Press Service

JERUSALEM — Tennis star Anna Smashnova became the most successful-ever Israeli player recently when she climbed to 16th place in the Sanex WTA rankings.

In a superb year which saw the 26 year-old Minsk-born immigrant win four major competitions and reach the million-dollar mark in career winnings, Smashnova surpassed Amos Mansdorf's previous Israeli high of 18 in the 1988 world rankings.

The culmination of Smashnova's remarkable year came at the beginning of November when she qualified for the Sanex WTA Championships in Los Angeles – an exclusive competition for the world's top 16 female players. And while the WTA number 1 Serena Williams soundly beat the Israeli, it would have been difficult a year ago to imagine Smashnova in such illustrious company.

Eighteen months ago, Smashnova seemed to be a spent force. She was ranked 128 in the world of female tennis, in which teenagers are already expected to have reached the top.

"To be honest, by the middle of 2001 my career seemed to be fading," she recalled. "I was very seriously considering retiring from professional tennis."

Her life changed in the summer of 2001 when coach Claudio Pustucelli took her under his wing.

Not only did the Italian become her personal trainer, the two soon became romantically involved and have been together ever since. Though Smashnova had planned to go to Israel to visit her family in Herzliya (father Sasha, mother Zena, and younger brother Yuri) during the November/December break before the new tennis season this month, she intended to spend most of the vacation in Rome with Pustucelli.

"Claudio has given me a new confidence in myself and my abilities," Smashnova said. "At the start of [last] year, he convinced me I can make the top 20 and I did. Now I believe I can reach the top 10."

Smashnova's results justify her optimism. During 2002, she beat many top 10 players, such as Kim Clijsters of Belgium, Jelena Dokic of Yugoslavia and Daniela Huntuchova of Slovakia.

Smashnova's road to recovery began in the fall of 2001, when she rose to 88 in the world rankings. She began 2002 by winning two straight tournaments in Auckland, New Zealand and Canberra, Australia. She had only ever previously won two WTA circuit tournaments in her entire career – in Tashkent, Uzbekistan in 1999 and Knokke, Belgium in 2000. In the summer she added two major tournaments to her tally in Vienna and Shanghai, the latter taking her total career earnings past the million dollar mark.

In fact money, or rather a lack of it until the past year, had been the main reason why Smashnova has not lived up to her childhood promise.

Born in 1976 in the former Soviet Union, she won the French Open junior title when she was 14, shortly after immigrating to Israel. Rising to 42 in the world rankings by the time she was 18, she seemed destined for stardom. But a reversal of fortune saw her slump to 260 by 1997. She was down, but not out, and suddenly surged back stronger than ever, reaching 35, a career high, in 1999. But last year a new slump saw her falling to 128.

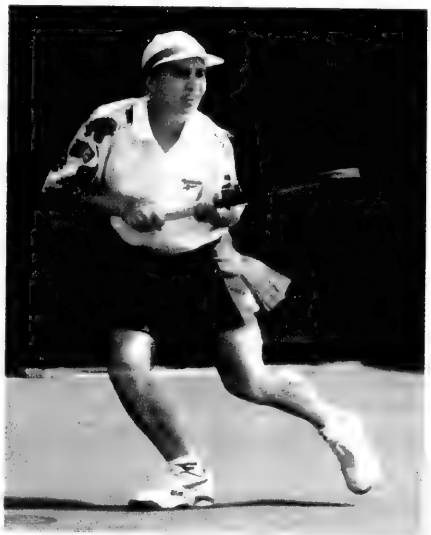
"Until I met Claudio, I always lacked a good trainer," she said. "In fact for many years I simply could not afford a personal trainer. In the highly competitive world of tennis it is impossible to succeed without top quality individual coaching."

Indeed, virtually every tennis star in the West today is the product of indulgent, wealthy parents who invest money, time and energy.

In the Soviet Union, Smashnova enjoyed the top-level intensive tuition that was always given to talented sports starlets. But in Israel, her immigrant parents – father Sasha, an engineer, and mother Zena, a housewife – were unable to give their daughter the kind of financial assistance that is vital for budding tennis stars.

The Israel Tennis Centre program in Ramat Hasharon for talented teenagers sustained her during her formative years, but as a young adult she struggled to build a serious career.

"I had to serve in the army for two years from 1996, and that inhibited my career," she said. "I was limited in travelling abroad and had no money for hiring trainers."



Anna Smashnova

Over the past year, Smashnova has been criticized at home for not being Israeli enough. In particular, many feel she could be using her international prominence to explain Israeli policies regarding the Palestinians. And on one occasion, she told a journalist from the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot that she would prefer to be interviewed in English rather than Hebrew.

"These criticisms really hurt me," she said. "I am a proud Jew and Israeli. I am always available to represent Israel in the Federation Cup and last year we reached a play off for the world group, which we eventually lost to the United States. This was very exciting.

"At tournaments," she added, "instead of asking questions about my tennis, journalists are always interested in Israel and the security situation there. I do not like to mix sport and politics. The situation in Israel is very painful for me and I am always scared that something will happen to my family. But I am not very articulate about politics and I don't feel qualified to discuss a very complex situation."

Regarding her request to be interviewed in English and the flak she took in Israel for it, explained that her "mother tongue is Russian and of course I am fluent in Hebrew, but for the past four or five years I have been on the international circuit almost the entire time and we all speak in English. When the journalist interviewed me I was very tired, and it just seemed easier to do it in English."

It is often noted that her name in English is highly appropriate for a tennis player, yet her close-to-the-net, smash-and-volley game is the weakest party of her play.

Smashnova is at her best at the baseline, patiently playing the long rallies until she is able to capitalize on an opponent's error. It is this stamina and patient determination that has allowed her to overcome her years of frustration.

But by her own admission, if she wants to reach the world's top 10, she will have to live up to her name and improve her "overhead smash-and-volley" game. And while she is strong on hard courts, Smashnova also needs to improve her grass game.

Smashnova's 16 ranking is also remarkable in that she had poor showings in 2002 at the four tournaments that really count – the Grand Slams – in Australia, France, England and the United States.

In Melbourne, Roland Garros and Wimbledon she lost in the first round, while at Flushing Meadow, she only made it to the second round. Smashnova's best-ever Grand Slam performance came in 1995 when she reached the fifth round of the French Open.

This month, Smashnova will have her first opportunity to rectify her poor Grand Slam record at the Australian Open.

And if a year ago she had thoughts of retirement, this year during the winter break she is anxious to get back on the court.

אניהו - אתגר קרת.

"אם היה אניהו יכול לבקש לעצמו הכל, מה היה רוצה? שקט? שקט זה רוגע, זה קצף אמבטיה, זה דשא צומח, זה מה שקורה במקרר שלך אחרי שהדלת נסגרת והאור הקטן כבה. בקיצור, שקט זה כלום ומהכלום הזה יהיה לנו כבר פעם מספיק, זה בטוח, אחרי שנמות."

About Food

By NORENE GILLETZ

January 2003 – a time for resolutions. First, exercise more. Did you know that the fork lift is not considered an aerobic exercise? Second, eat less and make healthier food choices. My doctor says I can still be president of the Clean Plate Club – just use a smaller plate!

Actually, I started in November, because most people gain seven to 10 pounds from mid-November until New Year's. It's the simple choices I make each day that have the biggest impact on my life – and waistline! I don't deprive myself. I focus on healthier food choices instead of dieting and deprivation. These tips can help you sneak more nutrition onto your plate.

It all starts out in the shopping cart. If you don't put it in your cart, it won't be in your kitchen! Make a grocery list in advance, grouping items in categories to make shopping quicker and easier. For maximum nutrition, focus on the Big Four – vegetables, fruits, grains and legumes. Choose whole foods instead of processed, packaged foods. Shop the perimeter of the store, where lean meat, poultry, fish, dairy products, produce and whole-grain breads are found.

Parchment paper is indispensable in my kitchen. It is extremely versatile and can be used both in the microwave and conventional oven. Foods don't stick, making cleanup a snap. Chef's Secret parchment is readily available in Canada and was recently launched at Kosherfest in Secaucas, NJ. It is pareve, re-usable and kosher for Passover.

Open "the weigh" to a healthy heart with this yummy recipe from MealLeaniYumm! 800 Fast, Fabulous & Healthy Recipes ($29.95 softcover, Gourmania). Enjoy!

SESAME SALMON

4 salmon fillets (about 1½ lbs.)
juice of ½ a lemon (or 1 tbsp. rice vinegar)
2 tbsp. lite soy sauce
1 tbsp. maple syrup or honey
1 tsp. Oriental sesame oil
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 tbsp. grated ginger
paprika
1 tbsp. sesame seeds

Place salmon in baking dish sprayed with non-stick spray or lined with parchment paper. Sprinkle with lemon juice or vinegar. Combine remaining ingredients except seeds and rub over salmon. Let marinate 20 to 30 minutes. Meanwhile, preheat oven to 425. Sprinkle salmon lightly with sesame seeds. Bake uncovered 12 to 15 minutes (or microwave covered on HIGH 6 to 8 minutes), until fish flakes when lightly pressed. Yield: 4 servings. Leftovers can be broken into chunks and added to salad greens or pasta.

284 calories per serving, 13.2 g fat (1.9 g saturated), 94 mg cholesterol, 34 g protein, 4 g carbohydrate, 529 mg sodium, 856 mg potassium, 2 mg iron, 32 mg calcium.

Chef's Secret parchment paper makes an excellent cover when microwaving. Place parchment under running water. It will become flexible so you can mould it around the baking dish easily!

The CIC challenges CBC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is threatening to take its concerns over what it calls the CBC's "unbalanced" coverage of the Middle East to Parliament and the federal broadcasting regulator.

The CIC said it is considering "directing an effort to get Parliament to revisit the CBC and its mandate and how faithfully they follow that mandate." In addition, the CIC may seek to make a presentation to the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC), the regulatory body that licenses broadcasters, said CIC chief executive Shimon Fogel.

The tough words came after a "disappointing" response by the national broadcaster to a CIC discussion paper that examined the CBC's Mideast coverage and found it lacked fairness and balance, contrary to the CBC's own reporting guidelines.

"I found [their response] breathtaking," Fogel said.

The CBC "consistently chooses to ignore the most critical issues and treat them with superficiality," he said.

In a discussion paper presented to senior CBC officials in late October, the Jewish advocacy group said that while some of the CBC's coverage is fair, much of it lacks balance.

Please see related story on page 18

The CIC called on the network to take several measures to make its reporting more even-handed. It urged the national broadcaster to increase the number of "sensitive Israel-related documentaries" it airs, to report on Arab and Muslim intolerance of a Jewish state and to ensure that its Mideast correspondent "provides Israel's perspective in equal measure, and with the same sensitivity, to that of the Palestinians."

It also urged the CBC to ensure that its Mideast correspondents achieve balance within each news report and to clarify the CBC's policy about not using the term "terrorism" and "terrorist" in connection with attacks on Israelis.

CIC officials presented the discussion paper to Harold Redekopp, the CBC's executive vice-president, and Tony Burman, editor-in-chief of CBC News and Current Affairs, at a meeting in late October.

Canadian students take Ben-Gurion!

These young people arriving at Ben-Gurion Airport late last month were among 1,700 Canadians that Birthright Israel brought to the Jewish state in 2002. In addition to Birthright participants, a record number of missions and participants went to Israel last year through UIA Federations Canada, (UIAFC). In all, more than 800 people went on 25 UIAFC missions in 2002. In October alone, six separate missions arrived with 230 participants. "The record number of UIAFC's missions emphasizes our strong commitment to Israel, especially during its current state of crisis," said Howard Weisband, director-general of UIAFC's Israel Office. Participants received briefings from government officials, Israel Defence Forces and police officers, journalists, medical personnel, aid workers, terror victims and Israelis affected by the present economic situation. Some were also able to go on patrol with civilian security guards and help restore sites hit by terror attacks, including the Moment Café in Jerusalem.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Birthright Trip

TORONTO — More than 400 Canadian students arrived in Israel late last month on a Birthright Israel program. The group is the first major contingent of the 7,500 worldwide program participants expected to arrive in Israel this winter. Birthright Israel aims to strengthen Jewish identity by bringing young people on their first organized, all-expenses paid, 10-day trip to Israel.

ISRAEL

Bulge Fixers

JERUSALEM — A team of Jordanian engineers last month began reinforcing a section of the Western Wall. They were brought in as a compromise between Israeli and Palestinian officials to repair a bulge in the wall's southern section. Jordanian experts who examined the wall last year said the bulge was caused by faulty water drainage. They recommended removing stones, filling the wall with reinforcing material and rebuilding the exterior.

Governor Rapped

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon reprimanded the governor of the Bank of Israel, David Klein, last month after Klein was quoted as saying that in the present economic climate, it would not be surprising if an Israeli bank collapsed. Sharon summoned Klein to his office to tell him the comments were "unfortunate." They agreed that if Sharon is re-elected this month, they will hold monthly meetings on the economy.

Small Increase

JERUSALEM — Israel's population stands at 6.6 million, an increase of 127,000, or 1.9 per cent, over the previous year, the Central Bureau of Statistics says. It was the lowest increase since 1990, according to the bureau, which cited low immigration as the cause, though aliyah rose sharply from Argentina and France. Israel has 5.3 million Jews and 1.3 million Arabs.

WORLD

Press Council Ruling

ZURICH — Swiss journalists have the right to call Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon a war criminal, the Swiss Press Council has ruled. The council, which decides ethical questions for Swiss journalists, ruled last month on a complaint filed against the Neue Luzerner Zeitung newspaper for a story last year attacking Sharon. The ruling cited freedom of the press as an overriding concern. Frank Lubke, director of the Center Against Defamation and Anti-Semitism in Zurich, said the ruling is scandalous and would set back efforts to combat anti-Semitism in Switzerland.

Decision Criticized

TEANECK, N.J. — The executive vice-president of the Union for Traditional Judaism has criticized the top lay leader of the Conservative movement, Judy Yudof, for asking its rabbinic leaders to reconsider the movement's ban on gay rabbis. In a statement, Rabbi Ronald Price of the UTJ, an independent group that is not affiliated with either the Orthodox or Conservative movements, said the request to have the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism reconsider its ban on gay rabbis "breaks with the Torah" and "is an attack on the core of our faith."

Arab Media Chided

CAIRO — The Egyptian president's political adviser criticized Arab media for anti-Israel and anti-Semitic diatribes. In a series of articles last month in Egypt's Al-Ahram newspaper, Osama Baz also urged Egyptians not to be blinded by racist views. "Our prejudices have made us blind, so we are not able to differentiate between good Israelis and bad Israelis," he wrote.

Munich Attack Praised

LONDON — British diplomats in Jerusalem showed sympathy for the Palestinian terrorists who killed Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics, the Daily Telegraph has reported. According to newly declassified documents, Gayford Woodrow, consul general in Jerusalem, sent a dispatch to the British Foreign Office six days after the attack, saying: "Before we reproach the Arabs too much, perhaps we might try to put ourselves in their shoes. They are, after all, human beings with normal human failings. The Palestinians in particular have seen their land taken away from them by a group of mainly European invaders equipped with superior armed force and modern technology." He added: "It is said that lives were really lost because of Israeli and West German bungling incompetence."

Davening Database

BERGENFIELD, N.J. — GoDaven.com, a database of davening times and contact information for Orthodox minyanim worldwide, has passed the 2,000 minyan mark, solidifying its position as the largest such Internet database. Yosi Fishkin, who founded GoDaven.com in 2001, said minyanim can register through a form on the site.

Record Number of War Crimes Prosecutions

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. Department of Justice launched 10 new prosecutions of alleged Nazi war persecutors in 2002, a record for the department's Office of Special Investigations (OSI).

Late in the year, the OSI marked its 10th prosecution when it asked a federal court to revoke the U.S. citizenship of a Queens, N.Y., man who allegedly served as an armed guard at an SS slave-labour camp in Nazi-occupied Poland. Court documents allege that Jaroslaw Bilaniuk, 79, trained at the infamous SS Trawniki Camp and in 1944 served in the Trawniki-based Deployment Company, which committed atrocities against Polish civilians and others. In late 1944, Bilaniuk was assigned to the SS Streibel Battalion, which rounded up and guarded thousands of Polish civilian forced labourers in south-central Poland.

The department has also asked a federal immigration court to deport a Florida man for participating in Nazi-led murders in Lithuania and Belarus during World War II.

Court documents allege that Vytautus Gecas, 80, served in the Second Lithuanian Schutzmannschaft Battalion during the time it killed thousands of Jewish men, women and children, as well as suspected Communists and their families and Soviet military prisoners. Gecas, who claims he was a student during the war, never obtained American citizenship after moving to Chicago in 1962.

Russian Jews in Toronto: a separate solitude?

Emigre operates Russian-language paper

Symphony musician speaks out

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

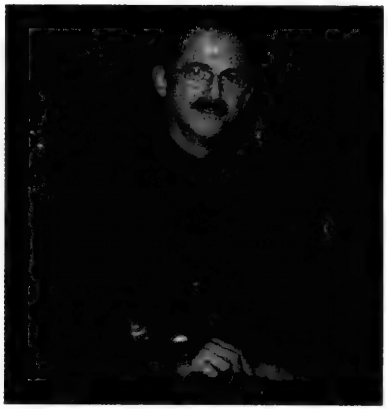
Almost 30 years ago, when Igor Korenzvit first arrived in Toronto from what was then the Soviet Union, the established Jewish community was debating how best to integrate him and his fellow émigrés into Canadian society and the wider Jewish community.

Given that the newly arriving Jews had little knowledge of Jewish tradition, programs that focused on culture, music, art, or even chess were considered promising. And since the Russians were largely secular and apparently averse to organized religion, exposure to the milder strains of Reform observance were also considered appropriate.

Though an estimated 40,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union (FSU) have arrived in the Greater Toronto Area in the intervening period, the debate goes on. Korenzvit, who now serves as president of the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), along with others with their fingers on the pulse of the Russian community, believe there are still relatively few points of intersection with the broader Jewish community.

Like the French and English in their adopted country, the Russian Jewish community and the 140,000 other Jews of Toronto inhabit two solitudes, aware of each other's presence and feeling a degree of kinship, but not interacting as closely as one might have expected.

Serving the Russian Jewish community from a modest set of offices in a North York strip mall, the JRCC will celebrate its 18th, chai, anniversary this year. As Korenzvit surveys the Russian Jewish scene, he points to successes and failures – or more precisely, room for improvement – in the lot of the Russian Jewish community.



Igor Korenzvit

With years of experience to draw on, he believes the established community could do more, particularly in opening its purse strings, to help the JRCC deliver services to its constituency.

"Canadian Jews feel they don't have to do anything special to integrate Russian Jews into the community," he said. Their point of reference is the earlier immigrant experience of their parents and grandparents, but "what they don't understand is that the Jews then were Jewish. They practiced the religion, had bar mitzvahs, knew the language and were integrated into the larger Jewish community.

"Russian Jews today are Jews by birth. Ninety-five per cent of them know very little about being Jewish."

Korenzvit, who operates a successful furniture business, believes Russian immigrants present a tremendous

A turbulent election

From the editor's desk

On Jan. 28, Israelis will be voting to elect the members of the country's 16th Knesset.

Never a placid place to begin with, in Israel, the democratic process – its public discourse and parliamentary debate – tend to be conducted in an intense, temperamental, even fiery manner. During an election campaign, not surprisingly, the intensity heightens, tempers flare and the fire burns hotter.

This campaign has already generated a great degree of heat, and it bears careful watching because there are risks that more than mere political egos may be singed.

Two recent political developments are the flints whose sparks are generating that heat. The first is a narrower, "micro" item relating to the Likud party specifically; the second is broader, relating to the operation of the Central Elections Committee and has more "macro" implications for the democratic process itself.

The Likud party is entangled in a web of accusations and investigations into alleged impropriety and misconduct surrounding the selection of candidates for its Knesset list.

Police are investigating accusations that members of the party voted for candidates in exchange for personal favours and other benefits. In effect, the charge sheet suggests, some candidates may have bought their places on the party's Knesset list.

Who knows where the trail of the police investigation will lead or what impact it will yet have on the party fortunes? (Of course, the frequency and nature of terrorist activities will, as ever, play a major role in determining all the parties' fortunes.) But, since the allegations were made public, the popularity of the Likud with the electorate has plummeted. In one week, pollsters recorded that it had lost as many as 10 seats in a potential Knesset configuration.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, however, has not been implicated in the scandal and he remains the most popular prime ministerial candidate among voters. Thus, in an effort to restore the party's damaged reputation and to ensure that the voters continue to see him as untainted by any of his party's unsavory dealings, he fired Naomi Blumenthal, a member of his cabinet, because of the negative impression she created for the party in asserting her right to remain silent when the police questioned her about her involvement, if any, in the Knesset list scandal.

If the electorate withdraws from the Likud, yet embraces its candidate for prime minister, the result will mean that Sharon will have an even harder task than normal in trying to cobble together a parliamentary majority and a workable government in the Knesset. Will he be able to reconcile seemingly different party platforms? On some essential security, economic and social interests, those differences seem to be irreconcilable.

The implications for the policies of any future government are far-reaching.

The second election-related development has even farther-reaching implications for the democratic process in Israel.

Last week, the Central Elections Committee (CEC) disqualified Ahmed Tibi, a former top advisor to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and a member of the Hadash-Ta'al party, from running in the upcoming election. It also disqualified Azmi Bishara and his entire Balad party.

The reason for the ban in both cases, was that these former MKs had supported terrorism against Israel. In two separate votes, over the objection of the committee chair, Supreme Court Justice Michael Chesin, the committee voted to ban the legislators from participating in the election.

The decisions of the CEC have aroused a great deal of concern in some quarters in Israel for the integrity of the democratic system. Many people warn that the decisions will have the effect of further alienating an already alienated Arab Israeli citizenry from participating in the mainstream of Israeli politics.

Indeed, over the weekend, thousands of people took part in two separate demonstrations in Nazareth protesting the CEC decisions.

The controversy does not arise over the inherent right of the CEC to place restrictions on who may stand for election for the Knesset. Every democracy on earth, to some extent, places restrictions on candidate eligibility. Rather, the controversy arises over the manner in which the decision was made.

In exercising its authority, the committee must interpret precisely written criteria that were enshrined in an amendment in 1985 to Sec. 7 of The Basic Law: The Knesset. The CEC may bar a candidate or a party from running in an election "if the goals or actions of the party or candidate negate the existence of Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, incite to racism, or support the armed struggle of an enemy state or terror organization against Israel."

Opponents of the disqualifications argue that the CEC's decisions were blatantly political acts. They violated the spirit of the law that requires so weighty a decision as disqualification to be taken at least with the guidance of, if not actually by, a judicial body. Law should never be mixed with politics, they contend. The fact that the committee's chair, the only member of the panel who is not a sitting member of the Knesset, opposed the summary nature of the decisions, was proof, they suggest, that the matter should be decided by a legal body on the basis of legal principles and legal procedures.

By the time this column is read, an expanded panel of 11 judges of the Supreme Court, on Jan 7, will have heard the appeals from the decisions by the CEC.

These are turbulent times in Israel. The campaign for the next Knesset merely reflects that turbulence.

YOUNG LEADERS: A group of about 30 young Jews from cities across Canada, shown here in the halls of parliament, met recently with parliamentarians during a political activism training retreat in Ottawa. The retreat was part of a yearlong leadership development program – sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee, UIA Federations Canada's young leadership executive and local federations – that trains young leaders to advocate for Israel in the political arena and to become active in Canadian political parties.

Ashkenaz Festival takes its show on the road

Yiddish artists to tour Europe

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture, which has imported scores of international klezmer artists to the popular biennial event at Toronto's Harbourfront, is embarking on an innovative reversal of that formula by planning to take a small group of Canadians to Europe this spring to meet klezmer artists on their home turf.

Toronto sculptor-designer Ian Leventhal, who has participated in Ashkenaz since its inception, has prepared a two-week itinerary that focuses on the three cities of Prague, Bratislava and Budapest.

The trip is designed specifically for musicians and artists, he says.

"Every two years there's an Ashkenaz Festival in Toronto, so the artists come to Toronto. The idea behind this trip is that we would, in turn, go to visit them in the off years between the festivals, so that we may see them perform and have workshops and discussions with them in their own studios and concert halls."

The purpose of the trip is "to explore the local emerging present-day Jewish culture," Leventhal says, adding that, of course, the itinerary will not neglect the past. The sightseeing tour of Prague includes all sites related to its rich Jewish past, such as the Jewish quarter, the Altneushul, the Old Jewish Cemetery and the Jewish Museum.

While in Prague, the group is scheduled to have a Shabbat dinner with members of the Jewish community and to visit the nearby Nazi concentration camp at Teresienstadt.

En route to Bratislava, Slovakia, which is a four-hour coach ride from Prague, participants are scheduled to visit the towns of Kutna, Hora and Trebic. The latter is a UNESCO world heritage site with a well-preserved Jewish quarter.

From Bratislava, it's a six-hour journey by hydrofoil down the Danube to Budapest, where, among other activities, a celebration in the Israeli Embassy on Israeli Independence Day is planned.

Full sightseeing in Budapest is included, as are an excursion to the nearby 18th-century town of Szentendre, the summer resort area of Lake Balaton and the wine-growing region of Badacsony. Participants are also scheduled to have a Shabbat dinner with members of the Budapest Jewish community.

The tour includes many klezmer concerts and many meetings with local Jewish artists. It is slated to depart from Toronto on April 28 and to return from Budapest, via Prague, on May 11. Transatlantic travel is on Czech Airlines.

"We're looking for filmmakers, visual artists, musicians and writers who want to join us on this exploration of Jewish culture," says Leventhal, adding that anyone interested in the arts is welcome. He would like to get 15 participants.

The cost is $3,899 per person, based on double occupancy, and includes all transportation, accommodation in three-star hotels and as many meals and sightseeing tours as outlined in the itinerary. Participants must also donate $50 to the Ashkenaz Foundation.

More details are available from Lynne Lim at Fisher Fremont Travel in Toronto. Call 416-481-3323 or e-mail flyaway@ican.net.

Matchmaker seeks basherts for people with disabilities

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Devora Alouf is on a mission.

With 13 years of experience as a professional matchmaker, her goal is to reduce intermarriage by uniting Jewish singles.

And with the launch of Jewish Singles with Special Needs (JSWSN), Alouf has intensified her efforts to help Jewish singles from diverse backgrounds find their bashert.

Although JSWSN is aimed at Jewish singles with disabilities, Alouf stresses that "the focus is on abilities, not disabilities."

She adds that "people with disabilities find the real connection – the soul connection."

A former teacher, Alouf turned to matchmaking out of a deep concern about intermarriage, which she calls a "holocaust."

She is the founder and matchmaker of Jewish Quality Singles, a matchmaking service.

Jewish Quality Singles is the sponsor of JSWSN, but the new service is non-profit and has its own Web site: www.jswsn.org. Members provide information about themselves and the attributes they are seeking in a potential partner and can also search through an online database of Jewish singles.

Alouf said she tries to meet most of the members by either visiting them in person or contacting them via phone or e-mail.

Devora Alouf

Although the site was just launched in November, there are already several members. Alouf said her next goal is to provide the service in Hebrew.

The idea for JSWSN can be traced to one of Alouf's matchmaking stories.

A New York-based client of Jewish Quality Singles had been corresponding with a woman in Miami who was about to fly to New York to meet him in person for the first time.

Alouf's client asked to meet with Alouf before this momentous first meeting. When she met with him, Alouf discovered that he had a physical disability – part of his body was paralyzed.

The Miami-based woman did not know this prior to meeting him and was unable to cope with the man's disability. But Alouf was determined to make a successful match for him.

"Then came a girl who was not handicapped but who was open-minded and I told her about him," Alouf said. "She met him and today they are married."

The client inspired Alouf to start JSWSN.

Alouf said she has found it easier to marry people with special needs than "people who are so-called 'perfect.'

"[People with special needs] are more spiritual, less demanding and more accepting," she said.

According to Alouf, her matchmaking efforts have led to hundreds of marriages since 1989, although she will not divulge an exact number.

With JSWSN, Alouf hopes to help even more singles find their soul mates.

"My ultimate goal is that everywhere in the world where there are Jewish singles, whether they are blind or wounded, they'll be able to connect with other Jewish singles," she said. "This [Web site] is a vehicle for communication, friendship, and hopefully marriage."

Roy family clan gathers in Toronto for reunion

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Roy clan can trace its roots back to 1860.

Fifty members of the Roy family came together recently in Toronto for a reunion and a celebration of Marmel (Mary) Roy's 75th birthday, who came from Israel.

Farley Mernick, whose late mother Belle Mernick was Marmel's sister, planned the reunion and served as its MC. He welcomed his aunt Marmel and spoke of the history of the family, who had come from Staszow and Bogoria in Poland.

Mernick's grandfather, Yechiel Chaim Roy, came to Toronto in 1911, and his wife, Esther Faigl (Gula), followed in 1918 with their two children. Most of the family on both sides was killed in the Holocaust.

"My zaide Yechiel, who was an ardent Zionist and Orthodox man, immigrated to Israel in 1950, a year after my grandmother died," Mernick said in an interview.

Farley Mernick is seen in Poland doing research on the Roy family.

Marmel was born and raised here, attending the Central High School of Commerce. But in 1963, she followed her father to Israel with her two children after a failed marriage.

In an interview, she said she always had a strong Zionist inclination but was not interested in remaining observant like her father. In Israel, she joined a secular kibbutz in the northern Galilee called Kibbutz Dovrat.

During a visit to Toronto in 1973, Marmel met a Lubavitch rabbi who rekindled her interest in observance. Soon after she returned to Israel, she left the kibbutz and moved to a neighbourhood called Afula Elite. In 1980, she went to New York and met privately with the Lubavitcher Rebbe.

Mernick said in an interview that "along with celebrating Aunt Marmel's 75th birthday, we pay a well-deserved tribute to her for the sacrifices she made on behalf of her family and for Israel."

He singled out her volunteer activities in Israel and her work with Shifra Puah, a network of Lubavitch volunteers who provide meals and assistance to women who are pregnant and housebound and to new mothers post-partum.

"She visits some 50 new mothers each month, brings them gifts, speaks to them of any problems they may have, and if they are interested, she teaches them about family purity," he said.

Mernick discussed his family research, and his recent visit to Staszow and Bogoria.

"It was exciting to research the family roots," he said. "We have circulated the family tree to the members of our family. I am delighted that there are four generations of Roys here at the reunion."

"It was a very leibedeck reunion," Marmel said. "We talked about old times, old friends. I am a very strong Zionist and when I come back to Toronto, I feel like a tourist."

Seen at the Roy family reunion is Farley Mernick and honoree Marmel Roy from Israel.

Along with her volunteer activities, Marmel swims, walks and does folk dancing regularly. She appears much younger than 75.

"Materially, I don't have as much as I had when I lived in Toronto, but spiritually, I am much richer," she said.

Moral emptiness at the CBC

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is actively challenging the CBC over the fairness of the national broadcaster's coverage of Israel and the Middle East conflict. Last year, in October, the CIC submitted a memorandum to Tony Burman, editor in chief and executive director of CBC News, Current Affairs and Newsworld, chronicling its concerns. Burman responded to the CIC memorandum last week. (Please see related stories in this issue.) But the CIC's concerns have not been put to rest.

The importance of the CIC's presentation to the CBC was powerfully underscored by a controversial broadcast late last month by CBC correspondent Neil Macdonald that questioned the validity of the Canadian government's decision to place the entirety of the Hezbollah organization and not just its military wing on the list of banned terrorist organizations.

That broadcast, in part, prompted Norman Spector, former publisher of the Jerusalem Post, former ambassador to Israel and to the Palestinian Authority, and chief of staff to former Canadian prime minister Brian Mulroney, to write an open letter – nominally to Peter Mansbridge – that was published in the Ottawa Citizen Dec. 21, 2002. The letter asked, rhetorically, when the CBC would use the term "terrorism" to describe the actions of groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas when they kill Israelis.

Spector's letter evoked a response from Tony Burman, published in the Vancouver Sun Dec. 26, which outlined in explicit terms the CBC's policy regarding the use of the term "terrorism":

"The words "terrorist" or "terrorism" are frequently used in CBC news programming to describe particular acts or people, including in Israel and the rest of the Middle East, but only when attributed. But… the CBC's practice is to try to avoid using the terms on our own as a form of description without attribution, and to let the viewer or listener make their own judgment…

"The fact is that who you think of as a "terrorist" usually depends on your point of view…

"As for the events of Sept. 11, 2001, we used the terms without attribution in the first four or five days after the initial attacks and then returned to our regular practice. There are currently no exceptions to this policy."

There a great many problems with this relativist policy espoused by Burman. But the most significant, the most alarming, is the utter moral emptiness that lies at its heart. If the "events of Sept. 11, 2001" were not terrorism, plain and simple, and if the deliberate targeting and slaughter of innocent men, women and children, whether by suicide bomber or sniper's crosshairs, are not terrorism, plain and simple, then, what, we ask the CBC, is?

More on Ahenakew (1)

The pain caused to thousands of people and especially to Holocaust survivors by Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew's hate-laden words during an interview last month with a reporter of the Saskatoon Star Phoenix is unforgivable. No matter how sincere the apology, the pain remains.

It is unforgivable for a former head of a national First Nations organization that strives to promote tolerance, understanding and mutual respect among all people, to utter such libels. Being a Holocaust survivor is not easy at the best of times. As we age, our memories of the horror we endured invade our minds and our daily life more and more, and we have had to deal with the likes of Ernst Zundel, David Irving and other Holocaust deniers.

What is surprising is that the audience of First Nations representatives did not shout Ahenakew down or walk out in protest. This silence is a form of acquiescence. I remember the silence when my world collapsed around me. It was on Yom Kippur in 1943 when the Nazis decided to, as Ahenakew put it, "clean up" the quarantine camp in Auschwitz-Birkenau. Among those sent to the gas chamber that day were my mother and sister. Their cries still ring in my ears. I saw the flames shooting out of the stubby chimneys of crematoria, devouring the bodies of our people, who, in the profane words of Ahenakew, "were fried." No one can imagine how hurtful these words are.

As a recipient of Canada's Meritorious Service Medal for my participation in the creation of the Toronto Holocaust Centre and my work in the field of Holocaust remembrance and education, I implore the council of the Order of Canada and Gov.-Gen. Adrienne Clarkson to revoke Ahenakew's membership in the Order of Canada. It is unthinkable that a man of such profanities, falsehoods and libel should join ranks with other recipients of the Order of Canada.

As chair of an organization dedicated to promoting understanding between Christians and Jews, I am immensely saddened by the comments made last month by Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew. That anyone in this day and age can still be blinded to the racist hatred that lies at the root of statements such as those made by Ahenakew is of great concern.

That someone in a position of leadership is capable of such distorted views and dares to express them suggests that the anti-Semitism from which they arise is more common than many would believe. The many current expressions of anti-Semitic hate throughout the world, of which this is one, should rouse us to challenge them wherever and whenever they arise.

We would like to lend my support to those asking the governor general to revoke Ahenakew's Order of Canada. To do anything less would be an insult not only to the Jewish community but also to the Assembly of First Nations and the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations and to all Canadians.

Rev. Glen Nelson, Chair
Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto

More on Ahenakew (3)

We shouldn't silence the voices of people such as Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew. Criminal charges will only cause others who hold these views to seek a deeper hiding place. Let them speak out. It will be painful and offensive, but it will give us an opportunity to challenge their views.

Ahenakew's remarks reveal that he suffers from a serious mental illness, a vile sickness that manifests itself as hatred. The good news is, it's treatable. A few visits to Holocaust museums, a few meetings with Holocaust survivors, would quickly awaken his dead nerves. He might even begin to understand that both native peoples and Jews have triumphed over prejudice, segregation, expulsion, forced relocation, religious persecution and genocide.

Ahenakew needs to open his heart and invite Jews to join him in native ceremonial dances that celebrate life. Then the Great Spirit, the Master of Life, the Creator, God, would be pleased with him.

More on Ahenakew (4)

If anything can drive home how this country has failed to enlighten its citizens about the horrors of the past, Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew's disgraceful comments recently about the horrors visited upon Jews by the Nazis should do it with gusto.

Ahenakew is not alone in his ignorance. For instance, in Canada, Edward Cornwallis, who made two attempts to exterminate the Mi'kmaq, is idolized.

I've spent my lifetime fighting racism and intolerance. No one can ever defend the attempts by one race of people to eliminate another. It is indefensible. As a Mi'kmaq First Nation citizen, I condemn Ahenakew's statements absolutely.

May the Great Spirit give us all the wisdom to love and respect one another and to expend our energies toward building a world society where all are equal. My heart bleeds for the millions of indigenous peoples of the Americas who perished as the Europeans took over North and South America. But it bleeds no less for the millions of Jews who died at the hands of one of the most horrible monsters that humanity has ever produced, Adolf Hitler.

May we learn from and never repeat the horrors of the past. I wish all the best to you, my Jewish brothers and sisters, and may the Great Spirit bless you always!

Daniel Paul

Lebanon and Hezbollah

Canada must reject the formal complaint by Lebanon against the Canadian government's decision to ban Hezbollah and continue to keep Hezbollah on its list of banned terrorist groups, outlawed according to the anti-terrorist provisions of the Criminal Code.

Canada must also recognize that Lebanon is a country that harbours terrorists and allows terrorist organizations to be part of its governing body. Hezbollah's representation in the Lebanese government does not legitimize it. Hezbollah's need for doctors, teachers and social workers does not minimize the severity of their murderous crimes against innocent civilians in Israel, Kenya and Argentina.

Lebanon must be made to understand that not only did Canada act properly in declaring Hezbollah a terrorist entity, but Lebanon is acting improperly by mixing into Canada's affairs.

Misinformation leads to hostility toward Israel

By LOOLWA KHAZZOOM

When people around the world hear about the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians, they assume that Israelis are white European oppressors and Palestinians are indigenous people of colour being taken over and kicked out of their native home.

Loolwa Khazzoom

The familiar script of European racism and colonization thus plays out in people's minds. It is from this understanding and the accompanying desire for justice for oppressed peoples that many people across the globe feel outraged by even the very existence of Israel. With the backdrop of this global perception, Arab leaders are able to pull on the heartstrings of conscientious individuals, to put all the blame for regional strife squarely on the shoulders of Israel and to escape accountability for their own actions.

Ironically, many Jewish leaders themselves are the ones who created the perception of Jews as "white." Arab leaders have merely exploited this perception to their own advantage.

Given the way Jewish heritage has been taught and presented for decades in the western world, when we say the word "Jews," the images that come to mind for most people are not the black faces of Ethiopian Jews or the dark brown skin of Yemenite Jews. When we look for Jewish names, we don't look for names like Comerchero, Sarshar, or Mo'alem. When we think "Jewish," we think Poland, Germany, and Russia. We think bagels and cream cheese, Yiddish and the Holocaust.

When much of the Jewish community itself renders invisible the faces and voices of Jews of colour, how is the world to know that Israel is not a white European nation yet again colonizing Third World, native people of colour? How is the world to know that the hundreds of thousands of Jewish refugees from Arab countries and their millions of children make up the majority of Jews in Israel?

The vicious anti-Israel hostility we witness today is the product of a cycle of misinformation, namely that all Jews are white Europeans, and, therefore, Israel is a white, European, colonizing nation, which, in turn, makes Israel a racist, apartheid state, which, in turn, means that Zionism is racism. And thus, anyone who is against racism must also stand against Israel.

Following this train of thought, progressive movements across the world are understandably anti-Zionist and anti-Israel.

But the reality is that Jews are a multiracial, multi-ethnic people. Most importantly, for 50 years, the majority of Jews in Israel have been Mizrachim – Jews indigenous to the Middle East and North Africa. This community of Jews lived in the Middle East and North Africa since time immemorial. Until the mid-20th century, in the 4,000-year history of the Jewish people, Mizrachim never left the region.

Consider this: The majority of Israel's Jewish population never had anything to do with Europe. To the contrary, Mizrachim lived on the land of present-day Iraq, Egypt, Syria, Morocco and Yemen before they were even called by these names, before there was such a thing as an Arab state.

Mizrachim lived there for 2,500 years – that's 1,200 years before the Islamic invasion of the region. Mizrachim have lived there since 586 BCE, when the Babylonian Empire destroyed ancient Israel and took the Israelites as captives to the land of present-day Iraq.

When Arab Muslims conquered the Middle East and North Africa, Jews were one of the few indigenous peoples who resisted conversion to Islam, the result being that the Jews were given the status of dhimmi.

According to this status, Jews were a tolerated yet inferior people who should be forever punished for rejecting the vision of Mohammed. What this meant was that Jews suddenly lost the autonomy they had enjoyed from their non-Muslim neighbours.

Jews were commonly forced into ghettos, prohibited from owning land, prevented from entering numerous professions and forbidden from doing anything to physically or symbolically demonstrate equality with Arab Muslims. This basic attitude of contempt, oppression, and humiliation permeated the daily life of Jews. In addition, massacres were not uncommon, at times wiping out entire Jewish communities.

When dhimmi laws were lax and Jews were allowed to participate to a greater degree in their society, the Jewish community would flourish.

Often, the response to that success would be a wave of harassment or massacres of Jews instigated by the government or the masses. Once disempowered and weak, the Jewish community would experience a period of relative quiet.

This dynamic meant that the Jews lived in a basic state of subservience. They could participate in the society around them, they could enjoy a certain degree of wealth and status and they could befriend their Arab Muslim neighbours, but they always had to know their place.

The Arab-Israeli relationship and the current crisis occur in the larger context of a history in which Arab Muslims have oppressed Jews for 1,300 years.

Moreover, Palestinian leaders had a strong hand in the terrorization and expulsion of Jews throughout the Arab world, leading to 900,000 Jewish refugees fleeing from the region.

In 1941, for example, numerous Palestinian leaders – most notably Hajj Amin al-Husayni, the Mufti of Jerusalem – arrived in Berlin, as guests of the Nazi regime.

Al-Husayni asked Adolf Hitler to apply the same methods against the Jews of the Middle East then being directed against Europe's Jews. Al-Husayni drafted a political declaration, which he presented to the Axis allies of Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy, in the hope they would adopt it. In paragraph 7, he would have Germany and Italy "recognize the rights of Palestine and other Arab countries [to] resolve the problem of the Jewish elements in Palestine and the other Arab countries in the same way as the problem was resolved in the Axis Countries" – that is, through genocide.

Furthermore, in a meeting between Hitler and al-Husayni on Nov. 28, 1941, Hitler promised the Palestinian leader that "[the] Führer would offer the Arab world his personal assurance that the hour of liberation had struck. Thereafter, Germany's only remaining objective in the region would be limited to the annihilation of the Jews living under British protection in Arab lands."

With these assurances, al-Husayni voiced his hope for a "final solution" to the Jewish presence in the Middle East in a speech given at a rally in Berlin on Nov. 2, 1943. The speech was carried by Nazi Germany's official radio network, Radio Berlin.

"National Socialist Germany knows the Jews well and has decided to find a final solution for the Jewish danger which will end the evil in the world," al Husayni said. "The Arabs especially, and Muslims in general, are obliged to make this their goal, from which they will not stray and which they must reach with all their powers: it is the expulsion of all Jews from Arab and Muslim lands."

Not long after, severe anti-Jewish riots erupted throughout the Arab world. Jewish citizens were assaulted, tortured and murdered. In a few Arab countries, Jews were expelled outright. Throughout the region, Jewish property was confiscated and nationalized, forcing Jews to flee from places they had lived for thousands of years.

We do not hear about the Jewish refugee problem today, because Israel absorbed about 600,000 of these 900,000 refugees. For the past 50 years, they and their children have made up the majority of Israel's Jewish population. By contrast, Arab states did not absorb the Arab refugees from the Arab war against Israel in 1948. Instead, Arab states built squalid refugee camps in the West Bank and Gaza – at the time controlled by Jordan and Egypt – and dumped innocent Arabs in them, Palestinians doomed to become political pawns.

Countries such as Lebanon and Syria continued funding assaults against Israel instead of funding basic medical and educational care for the Palestinian refugee families in these camps and elsewhere.

In 1967, Israel inherited the Palestinian refugee problem through a defensive war. When Israel tried to build housing for the refugees in Gaza, Arab states led votes against it in United Nations resolutions, because absorption would change the status of the refugees. But wasn't that the moral objective? Israel went on to give more money to the Palestinian refugees than all but three of the Arab states combined prior to transferring responsibility of the territories to the Palestinian Authority in the mid-1990s.

Israel built hospitals and educational institutions for Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. Israel trained the Palestinian police force. And yet the 22 Arab states dominate both the land and the wealth of the region. So who is to blame for today's refugee problem?

Without an accurate and complete view of the history in the Middle East, government leaders and peace activists will continue to push the region into an unstable future that lacks integrity.

It is time that we all hold Arab leaders accountable for their actions against all the refugees of the region – Jewish and Arab. Until that happens, peace will remain an illusive dream.

Opinions

Run Joe, run

Is it good for the Jews? Many of us find this old question too parochial and unworthy of consideration. However, U.S. Senator Joe Lieberman's impending presidential candidacy has even led cosmopolitan Jews to wonder: Is it good for the Jews?

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Some believe that high-profile powerbrokers are bad for the Jews. To them, 21st century America is no different from 20th century Germany. If he's elected, they argue, criticism of Lieberman will morph into criticism of Jews in general. I've even heard people remark that had Lieberman been U.S. vice-president, he (and the Jews) would have been blamed for the 9/11 attacks.

Personally, I find it impossible to worry about anti-Semitism in the United States. Indeed, Lieberman's overt observance of Judaism (in 1988, he didn't attend the Democratic convention where he was nominated to run for senator because it was on Shabbat) has been a political asset, attracting voters who are impressed by his sincere faith.

It is also notable that public discourse during Lieberman's vice-presidential bid carefully avoided the politically incorrect notion that his Jewishness might conflict with his patriotism. (Compare that with the 1960 campaign of John F. Kennedy, when Kennedy's Catholicism made him suspect of "taking his orders from the Pope.") Lieberman's candidacy is further evidence that contemporary America is a unique diaspora, a place where Jews can genuinely feel at home.

The real challenge that Lieberman's candidacy presents is intellectual. Crisis Zionists, who preach a Zionism based on the premise that Jews cannot be secure anywhere but Israel, will have to explain how a Jew could be a serious presidential candidate in a "hostile" country. Hopefully, they will be forced to come up with a more profound reason for Zionism. (Let me give them a hint: it has something to do with Judaism and Jewish values).

Liberal Jews, who see Orthodoxy as absurdly anachronistic, now have to deal with a potential Jewish president who is more observant than their own rabbis.

Orthodox Jews, who in the last 50 years have blithely created intellectual ghettos and avoided a dynamic role in general society, now must re-enter the world outside the ghetto and answer questions such as: when can a Jewish president violate the Shabbat? Is the prohibition against intermarriage racist? (Lieberman didn't have an honest answer to the latter question in his 2000 campaign).

All of these challenges have a common starting point: how should we interpret and practise Judaism in an exile with minimal anti-Semitism? While many Jewish thinkers have considered this question in the past 200 years, Lieberman's candidacy forces us to confront it once again. And that's a good thing, because anything that forces Jews to think seriously about Judaism is "good for the Jews."

A decisive election for Arab voters

For Israeli Arabs – who make up 17 per cent of the country's population – Israel's current Knesset election campaign takes place in the shadow of a polarized relationship with the country's Jewish majority.

The violent events of October 2000, when Israeli police killed 13 Israeli Arabs during pro-intifadah demonstrations, were a watershed moment in a historically troubled interaction. For Israeli Arabs, this was the climax of decades of discrimination. For Israeli Jews, Arab support for the intifadah and the active involvement of scores of Israeli Arabs in terrorist acts are proof positive of questionable loyalty. As a result, many Israelis don't differentiate between the hostility of their fellow Arab citizens and Palestinians across the Green Line.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Four weeks before the Jan. 28 election day, the intentions of Israeli Arab voters remain unknown. The February 2001 prime ministerial election was an unprecedented protest: from a 75 per cent Israeli Arab voter turnout in the 1999 Knesset election, the number dropped to 17 per cent in 2001. This month's election is therefore viewed as an indicator of Israeli Arabs' confidence in the Israeli parliamentary process, as well as in institutions and organizations that mediate and advocate on their behalf. These include the Knesset, Arab political parties, the Co-ordinating Committee of Arab Municipalities and various non-profit organizations.

A small number of Arabs and Jews recognize the danger of continued alienation and isolationism within the Arab minority. Over the last few weeks, the Israel Democracy Institute and the Dayan Center at Tel Aviv University have sponsored forums on this critical question, and several Israeli Arab newspapers have commissioned polls to clarify the public's positions.

Within the Arab community, the Co-ordinating Committee has called for participation in the elections, while the Islamic Movement has called for a boycott. The situation is further polarized by the Israeli attorney general's controversial demand that Azmi Bishara's radical Balad party be barred from running on the grounds that its platform supports incitement.

The pull towards isolationism is occurring while the Arab community's advocacy organizations enjoy unprecedented professional capability and sophistication. But therein lies the key. Precisely because Israeli Arabs can better present their positions to the instruments of the state, their frustration with indifference and inaction grows.

The latest example is the petition to the Supreme Court led by the Arab advocacy organization Mussawa, the Co-ordinating Committee and the Association of Civil Rights in Israel. The four billion shekels promised in early 2002 by former prime minister Ehud Barak for infrastructural development in Arab communities remain virtually unallocated. After numerous efforts at political pressure, the petitioners have resorted to a court ruling.

Both Mussawa and the Co-ordinating Committee remain committed to fighting within the system, but their ability to maintain credibility in their community will be compromised if they cannot deliver.

Opinion polls reflect this tug and pull. To date, only 50 per cent of Israeli Arab voters say they will vote, while 30 per cent have decided to stay home and the rest are undecided. A third of Israeli Arabs feel that no political body represents their interests effectively. And when it comes to the intifadah, polls belie the perception of overwhelming support for violence among Israeli Arabs: 65 per cent support an end to the intifadah and 83 per cent support non-violent resistance as a preferred policy for the Palestinians.

Most also don't see any active role for Israeli Arabs in the intifadah. Finally, in results that have been consistent over the years, 78 per cent of Israeli Arabs reject the option of joining a Palestinian state once it is established.

Ironically, some in the Israeli security establishment make the very differentiation that much of the Jewish public and its politicians do not. Past heads of the security services and national security council argue that Israel ignores Arab moderates at its peril.

If their mainstream advocacy continually yields poor results, the radicals will gain strength at their expense. Israelis will then have to face a growing demand for autonomous Arab institutions, such as a separate parliamentary body. While on the surface this may seem convenient, it will fundamentally challenge the principles of Israeli democracy and have long-term implications for Jewish-Arab relations in the country.

At the very least, a large Arab voter turnout on Jan. 28 will allow this debate to be conducted "in the tent" in a more inclusive manner.

(After this column was written, MK Ahmed Tibi was disqualified from running in the next election. The decision is being appealed.)

Merry... oops, Happy Holidays

Now that the holiday season has passed, it is worth pondering the status of Christmas in North America. One hopes the word "Christmas" is not offensive to readers of The Canadian Jewish News.

Actually, I assume people upset with the wish "Merry Christmas" have nothing against using the expression when talking to Christians. I certainly prefer saying that to Christian friends than "Happy Holidays." What bothers some people – extreme multiculturalists or militant atheists – is the generic use of the term when addressed to people who may not be Christian. They might also find fault with Christmas trees on the grounds of Canadian public institutions, finding them to be insufficiently inclusive.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

I have never really taken offence when wished Merry Christmas by people who may or may not know I am Jewish. I also do not take offence at things such as the Christmas tree that is displayed in the departmental office at my university. (Far more important was the fact that my office staff sent me a kosher food basket as a gift.)

Here are three reasons why I find "Merry Christmas" to be kosher.

First, I tend to be a social traditionalist. Though I suppose I am a non-believer, I value religion, at least the idea of religion, and the idea of God. I value the customs, rituals, holidays, cultural heritage, ethical values and sense of community that religions can sustain. They certainly add meaning to my life.

Therefore, I welcome the expressions of faith of my fellow citizens. Some people think religion and faith invariably lead to political conservatism, even intolerance. But for every Rev. Jerry Falwell there is a Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

The term "Judeo-Christian" also should have resonance for Jews. I recognize some of the theological complications implicit in the term. Some Jews do find the concept difficult to accept. But I think that Judaism and Christianity are sufficiently inter-linked that Jews should feel some measure of empathy with Christians.

True, Christianity and Christians have caused suffering for Jews. But today in North America, Jews can find common cause with Christians and recognize that the Judeo-Christian heritage has promoted shared values. And the unexpected truth is that religious Christians are now more likely to be philo-Semitic, or certainly supportive of Israel, while Jew-hatred and Israel-bashing flourish mainly in pockets of the Islamic world and the secular left.

Second, as it happens, mainstream Christianity has been very defensive, almost stigmatized, by the brigades of the politically correct. Day-care centers and schools that may be 90 per cent Christian give Chanukah, Kwanzaa, and Ramadan equal time. Christians are made to feel so guilty and fearful of giving offence that they tend to denigrate their own faith. Yet in many parts of the world, Christians are likely to be persecuted and even murdered.

Third, there is very little "Christ" left in Christmas. By this I refer not only to the rampant commercialization of Christmas, with its emphasis on gift giving and decorations, which is bad enough. (By the way, many of the same trends have affected Chanukah as well.)

It goes deeper than that. I was recently in two gift shops looking for Christmas presents and was struck by the absence of Christian symbols relating to the holiday. I saw no religious figurines, no manger scenes, no statues of baby Jesus or Joseph and Mary or Three Wise Men. But there were plenty of Santa or Santa-like figurines, lots of mistletoe, winter scenes, and the like.

At an office Christmas – oops, holiday – party that I attended, one of the children made a little speech about the true message of Christmas being the love we have for each other. No talk of Jesus being born and no mention of anything related to Christianity. This universalizing of the Christmas message avoids harming the sensibilities of non-Christians, though a cynic could argue that it just peddles Christianity with a softer sell.

This universalization also goes on for Jewish holidays as well. Thus Chanukah and Passover have been re-invented as holidays celebrating the universal messages of freedom. (At that Christmas party, I made sure to hand out Chanukah gelt to all the children present.)

So while I am certainly pleased when people wish me Happy Chanukah, I do not mind Happy Holidays or Merry Christmas. This should be our biggest worry.

The Kirshner File

Postponement of PA election is a setback

Last month's postponement of elections in the Palestinian Authority (PA), which had been scheduled for Jan. 20, was widely expected.

Palestinian officials had issued dire warnings that elections, called by PA President Yasser Arafat last September under international pressure to reform the much maligned PA, would be delayed if Israeli troops continued to re-occupy Palestinian towns such as Ramallah, Nablus, Hebron and Tulkarm.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel re-occupied them last June in Operation Determined Path, which came on the heels of Operation Defensive Shield. Israel launched these draconian military operations in an attempt to root out terrorism – the appalling spate of suicide bombings and shootings that have claimed the lives of some 700 Israeli civilians and soldiers since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising more than two years ago.

The postponement of the elections, which Israel and the United States had viewed as an opportunity to replace the current crop of PA leaders and democratize the PA, represents not only a setback for the cause of reform, but tightens the vicious circle of mistrust and mutual antagonism in which Israelis and Palestinians find themselves in this new year.

Traumatized by the ferocity and staying power of the intifadah, Israel has no intention of vacating the Palestinian autonomous areas unless the violence recedes. But without an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-intifadah lines, the Palestinians will not hold elections, an essential ingredient of reform.

In a nutshell, that is the maddening paradox both sides face as Israel gears up for its Jan. 28 general election and as the United States gets ready to officially unveil its "road map," the blueprint for peace endorsed by the other members of the so-called Quartet, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia.

The impetus for reform – a synonym for good governance, accountability, transparency and the rule of law – is supported by a wide range of Palestinians who yearn for a democratic civil society untainted by corruption and cronyism.

Palestinians who favour reform were originally drawn to the idea out of disgust with the scandal of fiscal waste in the PA, which was established in 1994 under the rubric of the Oslo peace process. In 1995, for example, the Palestinian controller issued a scathing report stating that $250 million (US) had already been squandered by the PA.

Beyond the problem of waste, Palestinian reformers hope to resolve issues revolving around violations of human rights, the muzzling of the mass media and the arrogance of the PA's interlocking security forces.

The attitude of Israel and the United States regarding reform has undergone change. As long as the PA was willing and able to fight and contain terrorism, they more or less turned a blind eye to its intrinsically authoritarian nature.

But once it was reasonably clear that Arafat and his associates were incapable or unwilling to deal with the plague of terrorism, one of the reasons for Oslo's downfall, Israel and the United States began to focus on the need for reform.

Ariel Sharon, Israel's current prime minister, seized on reform as an indirect means by which to sideline Arafat, his nemesis. Sharon, having branded him a murderer and a pathological liar and having compared him to Osama bin Laden, let it known that Arafat would have to be replaced before bilateral peace talks could be resumed. Israel's negotiations with the Palestinians were broken off by Sharon's predecessor, Ehud Barak, about a month before the February 2001 election.

When the intifadah took another serious turn in the waning months of 2001, Sharon severed official ties with the PA, Israel's defence minister declared that Arafat had fulfilled his historical role and should resign, and Israel increased the tempo and scope of its armed incursions into Area A, fully controlled by the Palestinians.

Not enamored of Arafat either, U.S. President George W. Bush declined to invite him to the White House, as Bill Clinton had done during Oslo's heyday. Nevertheless, the Bush administration hewed to the position that only the Palestinians had the right to choose their leaders.

There was a dramatic shift in American policy last June following back-to-back Palestinian suicide attacks that killed 26 Israelis. Bush, in a blunt speech on June 24, warned the Palestinians that he would not back Palestinian statehood unless Arafat was replaced, a "new and different Palestinian leadership" uncompromised by terrorism came to the fore and free and fair elections were held as part of a process of reform within the PA.

Subsequently, Bush declared that Washington could cut off aid to the PA if the Palestinians failed to embrace these changes. To hammer home the point, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell asserted that the United States no longer considered Arafat an interlocutor and that the Palestinians would cloud their prospects for nationhood by reelecting him.

Bush's ultimatum had an impact. On June 26, the PA released an ambitious agenda for reform – the "100 Days Plan." It addresses the importance of the rule of law and of the independence of the judiciary; speaks of the necessity of creating a modern and effective civil service and consolidating the multiple security agencies; affirms the principles of democracy; calls for a school curricula bereft of fanaticism and anti-Israel incitement; and condemns all acts of violence.

Marwan Barghouti

The "100 Days Plan," though yet to be carried out in its entirety, has accelerated the trend toward a heretofore unheard of phenomenon – homegrown criticism of Arafat, the living symbol of Palestinian nationalist sentiments and aspirations.

Since last July, a number of prominent Palestinians have joined the budding reform movement. Abas Zaki, a Fatah operative in Hebron and a member of the Palestinian legislature, called for the previously unthinkable – Arafat's outright removal. The imprisoned Fatah leader, Marwan Barghouti, openly challenged Arafat's leadership, saying the PA requires a new generation of leaders. In the same vein, three noted Palestinians – Haider Abdul Shafi of Gaza City, Mustafa Barghouti of Ramallah and Ibrahim Dakak of eastern Jerusalem – published an ad in the West Bank's largest daily, Al Quds, advocating a national emergency leadership.

Arafat also has been chastised by former PA minister Nabil Amer and by Sari Nusseibeh, the former PLO representative in Jerusalem. Amer rapped Arafat for his failure to set up orderly institutions. Nusseibeh spoke about a blitz on corruption. Ali Sadek, the influential columnist of the Ramallah-based Al Hayat al Jadeeda newspaper, charged that the Palestinian diplomatic corps is rife with favouritism and abuse of power. More recently, Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), an architect of the 1993 Oslo agreement, was critical of "the militarization of the intifadah."

Last September, in perhaps the gravest challenge to Arafat's legitimacy, rebellious legislators from his Fatah movement forced the PA cabinet to resign. In addition, the rebels circulated a proposal calling for a prime minister, who would share in the day-to-day administration of the PA. This proposal, if enacted, would have curtailed Arafat's powers. But it was not to be. In the wake of Israel's 10-day siege of Arafat's compound in Ramallah, a move generally perceived as a blunder, Arafat regained his footing, and the dissident Palestinian lawmakers caved in.

Arafat thereby won a pivotal victory, but judging by the latest Palestinian public opinion surveys, most Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip still support sweeping and fundamental reforms – the first essential steps toward Palestinian statehood.

The phased "road map" the United States intends to present after Israel's general election offers the Palestinians provisional and then full-fledged statehood. Sovereignty, however, is directly contingent on several key conditions, notably a cessation of Palestinian terrorism. But with Israel re-occupying Area A and Israeli Chief of Staff Gen. Moshe Ya'alon and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz apparently determined to score a convincing military victory over the Palestinians, the violence – which has killed about 2,500 Israelis and Palestinians since September 2000 – is unlikely to wind down any time soon.

The deadly stalemate is exacerbated by Arafat's reluctance to confront Islamic radicals in Hamas and Islamic Jihad, who do not accept Israel's existence. He fears that a confrontation would ignite a Palestinian civil war.

The impasse, which may yet be broken by a successful American campaign in Iraq to depose Saddam Hussein and his Ba'athist regime, postpones the overdue process of reform in the PA. And it worsens the plight of the Palestinians in the autonomous areas. Besieged by constant closures and curfews, which have caused widespread misery and virtually wrecked the PA's economy, the Palestinians, like the Israelis, deserve a better future.

In the Classroom and Beyond

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
בה"ס העבריים בטורונטו

A well-rounded education extends beyond the classroom. Some examples of this type of enrichment are frequent school trips to museums, conservation areas and theatre, and special visitors like authors and artists who come into the classroom to work with the children. Environmental studies are supported by "litterless lunch" days. On "Eat Smart Day", children purchase salads in the cafeteria and practice what they learn about healthy eating. Proceeds from the salad sales go to charity. This seamless weaving of diverse activities creates a multi-dimensional educational environment that addresses the needs of the entire child.

My Jewish Cuban experience

By LAURA LESSER

Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

A sense of curiosity and adventure, an effort to acquaint myself with the Jewish community and respect for my mother, who regularly attends Shabbat services, drew me to the Beth Shalom Synagogue in Havana, Cuba.

I primarily went to Cuba for the recent Havana Jazz Festival, but I reserved the Saturday to explore the Jewish side of Cuba. I had a preconceived notion that the synagogue would be barren except for a few old men and that there would be undercover police across the street documenting the shul's activities.

Did Cuban leader Fidel Castro keep his promise when he stated that there would be religious freedom for all Cubans after the Pope John Paul II's visit to the Communist island in January 1998? I had to find out for myself.

When I arrived at the synagogue, there was no security at the door, and there didn't appear to be anybody watching the goings-on at the shul from across the street.

I entered, and, much to my delight, I was able to follow the service. There I was in Cuba where the primary language is Spanish, yet the prayers were the same as they are everywhere else.

Hebrew and the prayers bring all the Jew of the world together. The only difference in Cuba was that when they discussed the parshah of the week, the congregants spoke about José not Joseph. Not a problem!

I asked for an aliyah and was granted one. I wore a head covering while being called to the Torah, which is the custom that I grew up with. The rabbi asked me about this, and I explained that it is the tradition in my synagogue for women to cover their head when being called to the Torah. He pointed this out to the congregation.

After Shabbat services, strangers came up, wished me a Shabbat Shalom and pecked me on the cheek. Kiddush in this country of food rationing was not just cake and wine. There was a luncheon consisting of soup, salad, spaghetti and strawberry ice cream.

After lunch, there was a dance presentation by Eugenie Kuffler, an American woman who acquired French citizenship while studying dance in Paris. She specializes in chassidic and Afro-Cuban dance and has a desire to reconnect with her Jewish roots.

She did a presentation titled "Los Ocho Lumes" depicting the post-World War II diaspora of the Jews of Europe.

During lunch, a woman approached me and asked me if I was interested in attending a fiesta that evening at the Sephardi synagogue down the street. I was more than happy to accept.

It turned out to be a bat mitzvah party for two sisters whose father had just converted to Judaism the previous year. We made havdalah, and the fun began.

There was Israeli folk dancing, modest but very tasty food and a sense of camradery among these people.

But the real fun started when the Latin music began. These were members of the tribe who can really dance!

Unfortunately, I had to leave because of a previous commitment. The gentlemen made sure that I got in a taxi safely and informed the driver of my destination.

The Jewish community in Havana is very strong and vibrant. I was made to feel very welcome, and I hope to return very soon.

Laura Lesser is a Toronto resident who recently returned from Cuba.

The most modest of trees

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

Tu b'Shvat is nearing and it seems difficult to pull our thoughts away from world events and take a moment to focus on the trees.

In fact, one might question whether it is appropriate to redirect our attention in such a way at this time. How could a day devoted to the new year of the trees possibly speak meaningfully to our present reality?

Jewish text and history are filled with significant trees. There are, of course, the original Tree of Life and the Tree of Knowledge, both of which remain hidden to us. Yet in all the grandeur of the tall and majestic trees in our texts, there is one tree that sits humbly, but quite meaningfully, apart: the thornbush.

The rabbis of the midrash identify the thornbush as the bush from which God spoke to Moses. It is more commonly referred to as "the burning bush."

The midrash is filled with commentaries that discuss why God would reveal such an important message to Moses about the exodus of the Jewish people from Egypt from such a lowly tree. But, of course, that is the point. In Judaism, we do not value that which flaunts itself above others, but rather the humble among us. We must sensitize ourselves to value that which usually goes unnoticed: the modest among us.

But this is no ordinary humble thornbush, for it is actively burning and yet it refuses to be consumed.

There, amid the flames, the bush sits unchanged and unchanging, and through this bush God instructs the leader of the Jewish people to free them from oppression. Here is the metaphor that reaches across the centuries.

In Exodus Rabbah, the rabbis question why the symbol of the burning bush is used when God spoke to Moses. They reply that Moses was worried that Egypt would consume Israel and she would burn to ashes. Yet God showed Moses that just as the bush was not consumed, so shall Israel endure and not burn.

Today, we are witness to global attention being focused on a tiny country, Israel. She is threatened and bombarded from within and without. Our hearts break as bombs explode and fire erupts and another family mourns.

On Tu b'Shvat, perhaps it is appropriate not to think of all trees, but to remember one modest bush that refused to succumb and delivered a message that changed the world.

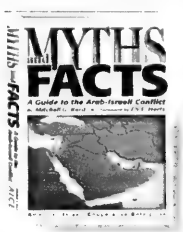
The truth about Camp David

MYTH:

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat rejected former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's proposals at Camp David and the White House in 2000 because they did not offer the Palestinians a viable state. Palestinians would have been denied water, control of their holy places, and would have been divided into cantons surrounded by Israelis. Israel would have also retained control of Jerusalem and denied refugees the right to return.



FACT:

At Camp David and the White House in 2000, Barak offered to withdraw from 95 per cent of the West Bank and 100 per cent of the Gaza Strip. In addition, he agreed to dismantle 63 isolated settlements. In exchange for the five per cent annexation of the West Bank, Israel would increase the size of the Gaza territory by roughly one-third.

Barak also made previously unthinkable concessions on Jerusalem, agreeing that Arab neighbourhoods of the eastern part of the city would become the capital of the new state. The Palestinians would maintain control over their holy places and have "religious sovereignty" over the Temple Mount.

According to former U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross, Israe offered to create a Palestinian state that was contiguous rather than a series of cantons. Even in the case of the Gaza Strip, which must be physically separate from the West Bank unless Israel were to be cut into non-contiguous pieces, a solution was devised whereby an overland highway would connect the two parts of the Palestinian state without any Israeli checkpoints or interference.

The proposal also addressed the refugee issue, guaranteeing the right of return to the Palestinian state and reparations from a $30 billion international fund that would be collected to compensate them.

Israel also agreed to give the Palestinians desalinization plants to ensure them adequate water.

Arafat was asked to agree to Israeli sovereignty over the parts of the Western Wall that are religiously significant to Jews (that is, not the entire Temple Mount), and three early warning stations in the Jordan valley, which Israel would withdraw from after six years.

Most important, however, Arafat was expected to agree that the conflict would end at the end of the negotiations. This was the true deal breaker. Arafat was not willing to end the conflict. "For him to end the conflict is to end himself," said Ross.

The prevailing view of the Camp David/White House negotiations – that Israel offered generous concessions and that Arafat rejected them to pursue the intifadah that began in September 2000 – prevailed for more than a year. To counter the perception that Arafat was the obstacle to peace, the Palestinians and their supporters suggested a variety of excuses for why Arafat failed to agree to a proposal that would have established a Palestinian state. The truth is, if the Palestinians were dissatisfied with any part of the Israeli proposal, all they had to do was offer a counter-proposal. They never did.

In his last conversation with former U.S. president Bill Clinton, Arafat told him that he was "a great man." Clinton responded, "The hell I am. I'm a colossal failure, and you made me one."

Israeli elections & the Net – Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Israelis are going to the polls later this month. Twenty-nine parties have submitted lists of candidates to the country's Central Elections Committee. On Jan. 19, the committee will publish the official candidates lists. In the meanwhile, hopeful candidates will be out shaking hands, making promises... and appearing on their party's Web site. Today, I begin a look at some of those sites – in no particular order.

Please note that it would be beyond the scope of this column to provide comprehensive information about each party's platform. However, after reading through the sites mentioned below and the media links I provided last time, you should be able to gain insight into the choices Israelis will soon be facing. All political sites provide Hebrew, English and Russian content unless otherwise noted.

Shinui (meaning "change" or "reform") sees itself in the middle of Israel's political spectrum with a classical "liberal" mandate. One of its central platforms has been its refusal to join a government that includes haredi parties. The Shinui Web site includes detailed pages in English about the party's principles, and biographies of its candidates, including leader Tommy Lapid [http://www.shinui.org.il/shinui2/eng].

Yisrael b'Aliyah, headed by Natan Sharansky, places a heavy emphasis on immigrant rights. As for the peace process, this party will only enter into negotiations with the Palestinian Authority after the "democratization" of Palestinian society. The Yisrael b'Aliyah site has a great deal of English content and even includes a form so "Anglos" can join English-speaking chapters of the party [http://www.aliya.org.il].

According to its Web site, Herut – The National Jewish Movement was founded in 1999 "when Israel's Likud government implemented the Hebron agreement and agreed at Wye Plantation to cede parts of Judea and Samaria, to the Palestinian Authority." The party, under leader Michael Kleiner, denies that a Palestinian state is inevitable. Kleiner would like to encourage Israeli Arabs who are not loyal to the Jewish goals of the State of Israel to emigrate [http://www.herut.org.il].

The Labor party Web site is one of the few that is in Hebrew only. It seems to have a great deal of background information about the coming election. Unfortunately, I had difficulty downloading this site's pages [http://www.aavoda.co.il].

However, the Labor party offers another Web site that is extremely impressive, although it really isn't an election Web site. The Moshe Sharett Labor Party Archive tells the story of the party through historical documents, essays and even artwork. I particularly enjoyed viewing the gallery of political posters that the party used going back to 1939. You can even browse through scans of the handwritten writings of the famous poet Rachel (Bluwstein) who moved to Palestine from Russia in 1909. Although some of the site is in English, most of the really interesting pages are in Hebrew only [http://www.archavoda.org.il/avodaarch/English/index.asp].

One of the most interesting sites I came across is actually an *un*official site. Shas, a haredi party that has found support among Sephardi communities, does not have an official Web site, so an anonymous, unofficial site has sprung up instead. The text of this Hebrew-only site explains the party's platform. But I was intrigued by the banner animation on the top of the page which states: "If you asked God which party to vote for, what would He answer you? Shas, obviously... Vote Shas for the holy Torah, the nation of Israel and God." Below that headline, a picture depicts Shas's spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef standing in front of a mountain (Sinai?). The mountain's summit is crowned by the Shas logo atop two white tablets [http://shas.web-site.co.il/].

Next week, more sites vying for the Israeli vote.

Discussing
IS ISRAEL A JEWISH STATE?

On its surface, Zionism was revolutionary, as it vowed to break away from old forms of Diaspora Jewish life. Yet many of the Zionist movement's goals, and the ways in which they have been achieved, reflect deeply conservative impulses. Despite conventional wisdom to the contrary, there is more continuity than rupture between contemporary Israel and the Diaspora.

DEREK J. PENSLAR is the Zacks Professor and Director of the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto. Professor Penslar has written extensively on the history of the Jews in modern Europe, Zionism, and the State of Israel. His most recent book. "Shylock's Children:- Economics and Jewish Identity in Modern Europe," was published in 2001 by the University of California Press. Professor Penslar is currently writing a book titled "Israel in History: The Jewish State in Comparative Perspective."

Professor Penslar will be discussing this topic from the bimah during Shabbat services, and at a luncheon following services. There is a $10 charge for the luncheon, and reservations must be made in advance with the synagogue 416-221-3433, Ext. 0.

Canadian student overcomes reservations at Oxford

By ALIZA CRAIMER
Special to The CJN

I began a two-year master's of philosophy degree in modern Jewish studies at Oxford University's St. Antony's College this past fall with some reservations.

As a Jewish student and moreover, a Jewish studies student, I was worried about living in England, given its reputation for anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism.

Although my goal is to learn as much as I can about the history of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict from different perspectives, the facts remain that I am Jewish and that I support Israel. I wondered before I came how I would be treated by the overwhelmingly pro-Arab (or Arabist, as they call themselves) Middle East faculty.

After reading an article by St. Antony's Israeli revisionist historian, Avi Shlaim, I was really worried. How can a department give me different perspectives if it is unanimously anti-Zionist? Thankfully, my supervisor, Emanuele Ottolenghi, is not one of these so-called "new" historians. He shares my conviction that one can be critical of certain Israeli government actions without jumping on the bash-Israel bandwagon that is so in vogue in England today.

My first introduction to Shlaim's revisionism was at a seminar on the Middle East that he moderated. During the lecture, he defined Israel as a rogue state – in part due to its use of terrorism, he said – and blamed the 1982 Israeli invasion into Lebanon on Israeli expansionism. He failed to mention the fact that northern Israeli towns were being shelled incessantly by the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), which is based in Lebanon.

As a former psychology student, I cannot help but be fascinated by anti-Zionist Israelis. I wonder what motivates them to propagate distorted views of history and to reject their country's right to exist. Criticizing government policies is one thing, but some academics seem determined to delegitimize Israel and condemn the Jewish state at every opportunity.

Since my arrival, I have noticed many differences between England and Canada (not least of which is the prevalence in England of smoking even inside public buildings and offices). On more than one occasion, my supervisor issued the ominous warning that this is not North America.

In terms of academics, the university offers numerous lectures on a wide range of Jewish subjects. As a graduate student, I am welcome to sit in on any of them. Officially, I only studied Hebrew last term, but unofficially, I attended lectures/seminars on Judaism, Islam, issues in the modern Middle East, Israeli films and more. I found it amusing when my new Israeli Hebrew teacher asked me if I had any Hebrew books. I replied that I had a siddur. Her response was, "That's not Jewish studies!"

As far as Jewish student life and learning at Oxford go, I am extremely impressed. There is a large and very active Jewish students' group on campus (called the Jewish Society, or JSOC), which has many social and educational events. The nationwide Union of Jewish Students organizes conferences and seminars, as does the Jewish educational organization, Limmud, which holds an annual conference that takes place for five days over the Christmas period (jokingly referred to as the anti-Christmas conference). The event attracts hundreds of participants each year.

On my first Friday in Oxford, I attended the first Jewish "event" of the year, Shabbat service at the Oxford synagogue. My new friend and fellow Jewish studies student, Ilana, and I were amazed at the turnout. I'd heard that there are about 100 Jewish families in Oxford, but when we walked into the shul, it was filled with students (at least 100 of them). It felt terrific being there with so many of my peers.

The shul, while set up with a mechitzah, is very inclusive of the different streams of Judaism: progressive, Masorti (Conservative) and Orthodox. The main service is Orthodox, but the other Jewish streams also have regular services. After the service, which was led by a great volunteer chazzan (there is no rabbi), we poured into the hall. I met at least 10 new people on my way to the coatroom.

After that, Ilana and I had not one, but two dinner invitations. We opted for the weekly graduate students' Shabbat potluck. Our host for the evening lives a stone's throw from the shul and as we filed up the stairs to his row house, I was in awe at the number of friendly Jewish students in attendance. It was especially nice hearing so many voices as we recited the brachot together.

The time flew by and as Ilana and I walked home on a typical rainy English night, we agreed that the dinner was a success. Though the meal was terrific, the best part of the evening was talking with so many great people. A PhD student told me that there are three types of Jews at Oxford: the Jewish Jew, the anti-Jewish Jew and the wannabe WASP/academic Jew. So far, I have met at least one of each. But at this dinner, the room was overwhelmingly filled with Jewish Jews. Indeed, the large number of genuine, interesting and down-to-earth Jews was refreshing. Friday nights have since become a major highlight of my week.

MONTREAL — Both Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada are seeking intervener status in Concordia University Hillel's civil action against the student government and the university administration.

Hillel has filed a lawsuit in Superior Court claiming $100,000 in punitive damages and asking for the repeal of Concordia Student Union (CSU) resolutions that demand it apologize for distributing information on an Israel Defence Forces program for Diaspora Jews and that it sign an agreement not to do so again. Until it signs, its funding from the CSU will be withheld.

Meanwhile, the CSU is demanding that all student clubs under its umbrella sign the same agreement, which bans any military recruitment, or also lose their funding.

"CJC will not stand idly by as Jewish students are persecuted and their organizations disenfranchised," said CJC national president Keith Landy. "This ignoble… assault on a legitimate university club providing cultural, social and religious programs for Jewish students on campus sets a dangerous precedent and cannot go unchallenged."

B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights Quebec chair Allan Adel said, "We also want to stand together with the silent majority of students who want a better quality of life on campus, who want to be free from intimidation and harassment."

CJC has also established a legal assistance fund for Hillel and is soliciting donations from the community. The organization has also offered space to Hillel in the premises it maintains in Samuel Bronfman House, its former national headquarters that it donated to Concordia.

Coast to Coast

What is the point of the Palestinian struggle?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

What are the aims of the Palestinian struggle? In an editorial entitled "A road map toward peace," the Globe and Mail tries to make a distinction between the pronounced aims of Hamas and Islamic Jihad to "annihilate" Israel, and those of the Palestinian Authority, which maintains that it is reacting solely to the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and has no further territorial ambitions (Dec. 27, 2002).

In the same edition of the Globe, Shira Herzog acknowledges this unresolved tension, but notes that by engaging in violence and sanctioning terrorism, PA leader Yasser Arafat has alienated even those Israelis who might criticize their country's policies. While most Israelis had always been suspicious of Arafat, the majority were prepared to deal with him to obtain a permanent peace.

Arafat's rejection of Ehud Barak's generous peace offer and subsequent Palestinian violence created a profound change in the Israeli psyche. It left Israelis believing that not much separates Arafat and major elements of his Fatah faction from the Islamic extremist groups, and that there is no one to negotiate with. Even Britain's The Economist, not known for being pro-Zionist, branded Arafat a "terrorist recidivist" who passed up a deal that comes around once every 50 years or so (a reference to the partition plan of 1947).

As former U.S. Mideast peace envoy Dennis Ross has written, "Neither side believes that any change is possible as long as Yasser Arafat remains leader of the Palestinians" ("Mapping Out Peace in the Mideast" Los Angeles Times, Dec. 20).

Today Israelis realize that not only are Hamas and Islamic Jihad opposed to Israel's existence, but major sectors of Palestinian society and its secular political movements are opposed as well.

Several Ha'aretz writers have discussed this subject. Amira Hass reported that a small majority of Palestinians – 51 per cent – declared that the intifadah was not about merely ending the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip but about destroying Israel (June 13). A recent December poll conducted by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Center mostly confirmed this statistic: 47 per cent of Palestinians believes that the goal of violence is the "liberation of all of historic Palestine."

'Major sectors of Palestinian society are opposed to Israel's existence'

On Nov. 26, Ha'aretz writer Amir Oren summarized the prevailing Israeli attitude: "All told, Israel's public evinces a dialectic approach that aspires to compromise – more concessions than [former Israeli prime minister Benjamin] Netanyahu and [Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon would accept, but not one-sided concessions that would be liable to perpetuate the dispute rather than ending it ([Labor leader Amram] Mitzna's platform stirs precisely this concern)."

Last month, Ari Shavit wrote, "The basic paradox of Israeli politics is the dove-hawk paradox: Why are the overwhelming majority of Israeli doves in their basic positions yet hawks in their voting patterns? Why are Israelis doves in the long term but hawks in the short term? And why, even though they believe in evacuating the Jewish settlements in the territories, do they nonetheless want Ariel Sharon as prime minister?" (Ha'aretz, Dec. 12).

Good questions indeed.

Spector slams CBC's Middle East coverage

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is not the only one taking the CBC to task these days.

In the last few weeks, Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel and the Palestinian territories, has engaged in a war of words with the CBC that is becoming increasingly heated.

The latest round of disagreement began before Christmas with the publication in the Ottawa Citizen of Spector's open letter to CBC news anchor Peter Mansbridge. That letter drew a spirited response from Tony Burman, editor-in-chief of CBC News, Current Affairs and CBC Newsworld and was followed by a lengthy – and angry – piece by Spector that appeared in the Dec. 30 edition of the Victoria Times-Colonist.

In Spector's initial letter, the former envoy indirectly linked the recent anti-Semitic rant of Native leader David Ahenakew to CBC's coverage of the Middle East.

Spector pointed to a CBC reporter's description of "pressure tactics" by the "Jewish lobby" as the reason behind the government's decision to ban the political wing of Hezbollah and he concluded: "Judging from my e-mail, that kind of language in reports on the Mideast can only serve to encourage David Ahenakew and his ilk in their demented view of the world."

Spector also examined the refusal of the CBC to employ the word "terrorism" with respect to attacks on Israelis, noting the network did use the term in describing the Bali nightclub bombing that claimed the lives of Australians, Canadians and Britons.

"Reluctantly, I've concluded this double standard of morality infuses CBC reporting," Spector wrote.

Responding to Spector's letter with one of his own, Burman argued that the former ambassador's "entire point was predicated on a misunderstanding of the CBC's actual practice."

The CBC, he said, does use the words "terrorist" and "terrorism" when they are attributed to a speaker. "But as with most leading news organizations in the western world, the CBC's practice is to try to avoid using the terms on our own as a form of description without attribution, and to let the viewer or listener make their own judgment."

Burman acknowledged several "lapses" in the policy in reporting on the Bali incident. "This was done in error and it was not repeated in subsequent news programming."

Similarly, he said the use of the terms was discontinued in connection to the 9/11 attacks in the United States after the first four or five days, when the CBC "returned to our regular practice."

Spector's response, again in the form of an open letter, was scathing. Spector challenged the CBC news chief to debate his contention that the CBC's Mideast coverage encouraged "demented views" such as those advanced by Ahenakew.

Furthermore, Spector said remarks by a CBC reporter that attributed the government's change in policy on Hezbollah to a "Jewish lobby" and "pressure tactics" brought shame on the CBC.

"Shame on you, personally, for resorting to similarly crude stereotypes to dismiss critics," Spector added.

Spector next took aim at Neil Macdonald, the CBC's Mideast correspondent, saying the reporter's lack of knowledge of Hebrew leaves him ill-equipped to report on Israel's medical, cultural, scientific and technological achievements.

Continuing his slap at Macdonald, Spector notes the reporter is studying Arabic, yet "it's curious that Macdonald has not reported more frequently from Egypt, Saudi Arabia and Syria – in carrying out his self-described mandate of 'holding up what's going on up to the mirror of Canadian values.' Nor have we heard much about Syria's de facto occupation of Lebanon.

"The toxicity of this double standard on democracy and human rights is compounded by the frequent omission of context from his reports," Spector continued, pointing out Macdonald has failed to explain that Hamas' opposition to Israeli occupation "means elimination of the Jewish state."

Turning to Macdonald's report on the recent shooting of Israelis in Hebron, Spector noted the reporter cited the 1994 murder of 29 Arabs by Baruch Goldstein. "He could also have reasonably alluded to the brutal slaughter of Jews in 1921, 1929 and 1936 by determined opponents of the establishment of any Jewish state, of whatever size."

Spector saved some of his most blistering language for a critique of the CBC's refusal to label groups like Hamas as terrorist.

"Aside from being irresponsible and amoral, your failure to call Hamas a terrorist organization betrays another double standard. When the blood on the sidewalk is Israeli, it's one thing, when American, it's another."

Pressing his point, Spector dismisses the CBC's claim that it does not use the term "terrorism" as that would mean adopting the terminology of one side.

"Say what?" Spector asks. "We must be watching different channels, if not in different languages. Because, while I sometimes agree with your terminological choices, it's clear the CBC, like the Tower of Pisa, always leans in one direction.

"Your reporters do not leave viewers to decide whether curfews are self-defence measures; they unambiguously refer to 'collective punishment,' the Palestinian term and a crime under the Geneva Conventions. You call Israel's targeted killings, though not the recent U.S. one in Yemen, 'assassination' – a word used by Palestinian spokespersons but not normally conferred by CBC on any mass murderers, other than, it appears, those who send bombers to blow up babies in Jerusalem pizzerias. Your correspondents refer to the 'occupation' and to the West Bank and Gaza as 'occupied Palestinian land' not as disputed territory.

"And they call Israeli communities 'settlements' and their residents 'settlers,'" Spector said, noting also the Israeli claim to that land is stronger than that of his neighbours in British Columbia, who have settled on aboriginal land.

Spector concludes by pointing out the CBC's own ombudsman has found there is nothing in the network's journalism policy that would prevent reporters from using the term "terror attack."

"I'm frankly appalled the guy calling the shots at Canada's national broadcasting service believes it's an error to call these murderers what they are," he said.

While perhaps angriest in tone and most passionate in delivery, Spector's piece was not the only one criticizing the CBC for its coverage of the Middle East.

Earlier, Israel Asper, executive chair of the CanWest Global Communications, told an Israeli bond audience that the CBC "provides slanted and biased information" as well as "dishonest reporting."

An editorial in the National Post, a newspaper controlled by Asper, slammed the corporation's reportage about Ottawa's decision to ban Hezbollah, while a column in the same paper by Robert Fulford carried the headline "The CBC lines up behind Hezbollah."

Burman called the Post stories "seriously misleading" and he rejected suggestions that CBC's coverage whitewashed the Lebanon-based group.

"More than any news organization in Canada, the CBC has frequently documented the many violent actions of Hezbollah," he stated in a piece carried in the Post.

The CBC's story that came in for attack "wasn't about whether Hezbollah was good or bad. The issue was the Canadian government's change of policy on Hezbollah, and whether that change was based, at least in part, on incorrect information."

Burman noted that Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham changed his view against banning the organization's political wing after news reports quoted Hezbollah's leader urging suicide bombers to take their campaign worldwide.

Macdonald travelled to Beirut to investigate the story and found the statement was never made, Burman said.

CIC challenges CBC coverage

The CBC's response was couriered to the CIC just before the new year. In it, the government-funded network agreed to refer the CIC's complaint about several specific news reports to "our senior journalists" for examination, and it agreed to consider CIC suggestions for previously un-aired documentary topics. But it rejected much of the CIC's criticism of bias.

In a written response to the CIC, Burman stated, "It is important to bear in mind that there are two sides to most stories and the conflict in the Middle East is no exception. It is the duty of CBC Television to inform its viewers across the country about what is happening, without bias or prejudice, and without telling them what to think. We believe it is our obligation to report accurately, fairly and truthfully. Our reporting will not necessarily satisfy all our viewers, but they do have a right to expect that we will be straightforward and honest."

Addressing the CIC's concerns over the failure to use the words "terrorism" and "terrorist" with respect to Palestinian attacks on Israeli civilians, Burman wrote: "The CBC's policy about 'terrorism' is not difficult to understand, although I certainly acknowledge it is misunderstood by many in the Canadian Jewish community. And this is because it has been distorted in public comments by Izzy Asper [chair of CanWest Global], by your organization, by the CanWest organization including the National Post and Southam and most recently by newspaper columnist Norman Spector. It [is] hard not to wonder whether this misrepresentation of the CBC's practice is not willful."

Burman also accused the CIC of orchestrating an e-mail campaign concerning the network's coverage, which generated messages from people who had never seen the CBC's reports and which were "a waste of everyone's time."

Joseph Wilder, national chair of the CIC, said the organization's staff had been following CBC reports on the Mideast for years and their investigation showed the network's unbalanced coverage "wasn't just episodic. It was a pretty well-defined condition that the CBC was biased against Israel."

The CIC was particularly concerned with reportage by the CBC's Mideast correspondent, Neil Macdonald, who it charged has injected personal views in numerous news stories – almost always to Israel's detriment.

Macdonald has been quoted as saying his job is to afflict the comfortable and comfort the afflicted, Wilder said. "If you analyze that statement, he has to decide in advance who is the afflicted. He has decided the Palestinians are the afflicted ones and he has to comfort them. To us, that's not news reporting."

The CIC asked that the CBC "undertake a review and conduct an analysis of Mr. Macdonald's reports" to investigate complaints that his coverage is not fair or balanced.

The discussion paper examined approximately 40 of Macdonald's reports since January 2002 and found "only seven of these were reflective of Israel's story. Twenty were reflective of the Palestinian story and highly critical of Israel, several extremely so, and 10 were arguably even-handed."

Macdonald's reports from Aug. 13 to Oct. 3 were "particularly egregious," the discussion paper continued. In addition to failing to provide context for events, "Macdonald focused in nine stories from the territories on alleged Israeli mistreatment of Palestinians. Quotes from Israeli officials in each of these reports are more token than substantial and as such do not provide context... Missing are any stories about alleged Palestinian human rights abuses," such as a failure to report on a decision by the Palestinian journalists' union to ban stories about children being recruited as suicide bombers.

The CBC response relied heavily on two reviews by its ombudsman, David Bazay, who had addressed earlier complaints by two viewers about Macdonald's reportage. The first review was excerpted from the ombudsman's 2001-2002 annual report and dealt only with broadcasts to the end of March 2002. The second was a letter dated June 21, 2002 addressed to Howard Liebman, but that review did not address the CIC's specific complaints of Macdonald's reports of March 2002 and the "egregious block" of reports from Aug. 13 to Oct. 3.

In a letter to viewer George Fleischmann, excerpted from the annual report, Bazay wrote: "I conducted an extensive review of Mr. Macdonald's work, examining more than 40 news items... I thought it entirely unfair to call Mr. Macdonald's reporting on the conflict 'blatantly one-sided.' Mr. Macdonald told me that 'I report what I see on a daily basis and I work deep in the field of the conflict zones, places most people other than Palestinians, Israeli troops or settlers just don't go. I am sorry Mr. Fleischmann doesn't like what I find there.'"

In the second review, dated June 21, 2002, Bazay stated that he examined all items filed by the CBC's Jerusalem bureau between September 2001 and June 2002. "I found CBC's overall coverage in the period under review to be generally well-balanced, giving fair and reasonable voice to both the Israeli and Palestinian points of view."

Macdonald was not the only CBC reporter criticized by the CIC. The discussion paper pointed to an Aug. 4, 2002, broadcast of Foreign Assignment, a program that features discussions with the network's reporters stationed abroad, in which Paul Workman acknowledged that one of his reports from Bethlehem did not attempt to achieve balance.

"That wasn't our intention," Workman stated. "Balance, I think, is a larger picture. Our coverage, I'm sure, balances out very well when you add in all the material that comes out of the Middle East."

Wilder said reporters were not the only problem with CBC news coverage. "Dozens are involved in news programs, including people from higher up... The process goes through many hands."

The CIC, Wilder continued, "found an inherent bias against Israel in the CBC news reporting. We said there was a subculture, a left-of-centre point of reference."

"The entire narrative of the last two years has been distorted by the CBC."

Zucker was a major patron of Hamilton art community

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Irving Zucker, a prominent philanthropist and patron of the arts, died last month at age 82.

Obituary

Named a member of the Order of Canada in 1997, Zucker was recognized for his integral support of the local arts and learning community. In 1995, he was inducted into the Hamilton Gallery of Distinction.

An avid art collector for many years, Zucker provided the funds for the restoration of the Blair Bruce painting collection at the Art Gallery of Hamilton in 1988. He donated works of art valued at $2.5 million to the gallery in 1991.

In 1994, he donated seven sculptures from his own garden to the Art Gallery of Hamilton. The sculptures are now located in the Irving Zucker Sculpture Court on Commonwealth Square, adjacent to the gallery.

Jordan Livingston, chair of the board of governors of the Art Gallery of Hamilton, described Zucker as "a tremendous supporter of the arts and artists."

He said Zucker served as a patron to striving artists, supporting them anonymously and providing them with a boost in their careers.

"He was a great friend as well."

Zucker donated $500,000 toward the construction of the building that houses Hamilton's professional theatre, Theatre Aquarius. The Mainstage Series of plays is performed at the Irving Zucker Theatre, which seats 750.

Zucker was born in Hamilton in 1920. He joined the Royal Canadian Air Force in World War II and trained air crews in bombing and gunnery.

After the war, Zucker founded radio stations CHIQ and CHAM and later owned a network of stations. He bought CKOC/K-Lite FM in Hamilton and CJBK in London in 1993 and sold them in 1999.

Zucker was also president of Standard Industries and Public Service Lighting, and he was a director of Income Life Insurance Co.

In 1967, he founded the Irving Zucker Foundation, which established scholarships at McMaster University. He also funded the Zucker lecture series at the Michael G. Degroote School of Business.

In 1999, Zucker endowed McMaster's faculty of health sciences with the Albert Einstein-Irving Zucker Chair in Neuroscience. The university matched Zucker's $1 million donation.

The Hamilton Health Sciences Foundation honoured him in 1999 for his commitment to area hospitals.

In 1983, Zucker was appointed to the Economic Council of Canada for three years. In 1996, he was named to the board of the Canada Council for the Arts. He was also a citizenship court judge.

Four years ago, McMaster awarded him an honorary doctor of laws degree.

A Negev Dinner honoree in 1967, Zucker supported numerous Jewish institutions. The Beth Yitzchak Irving Zucker College of Jewish Studies was a result of his large contribution to the Hamilton Hebrew Academy. A wing of Sholom Village, a local seniors' nursing home and residence, is named in his honour. He donated sculptures to both the Adas Israel Synagogue and Temple Anshe Sholom.

More than 300 people attended Zucker's funeral at Adas Israel, including former Ontario lieutenant-governor Lincoln Alexander, federal cabinet minister Sheila Copps and Hamilton Mayor Bob Wade.

Rabbi Daniel Green of Adas Israel Synagogue officiated. McMaster president Peter George and Zucker's daughter, Susan Zucker-Rakoff, also spoke, as did Rabbi Bernard Baskin.

'Wealth was an instrument to be used, not a diety to be worshipped'

In his eulogy, Rabbi Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Temple Anshe Sholom and Zucker's friend for more than 50 years, said Zucker "was a singular personality whose many-sided achievements and multiple benefactions have rarely been equalled in Hamilton."

Rabbi Baskin said that in evaluating Zucker's life and accomplishments, "what assumes prime importance was not his astute business enterprises, but his selfless involvement in a host of communal organizations and his magnificent gifts and donations to so many of our cultural and medical institutions."

Rabbi Baskin said that for Zucker, "wealth was an instrument to be used, not a diety to be worshipped. He drew his inspiration from the Talmudic dictum, 'The beginning and the end of Torah is the performance of loving kindness.'"

Zucker leaves his children, Martin, David and Susan Zucker-Rakoff, brother Bernard Zucker, sister Faye Leibtag and close companion Irene Hale.

Immigration from Soviet Union came in three waves talent pool that would add to the quality of Jewish life in Toronto, or as he put it, provide "fresh blood for the community.

"If we don't succeed," he continued, "the danger is that they'll keep being Russian for a while and their kids will be Canadian with some Russian background, but not Jewish Canadians or Canadian Jews. We will lose them as Jews."

Contrary to the received wisdom of past years, Korenzvit believes the old-new approach adopted by the JRCC's long-serving executive director Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, a member of the Lubavitch movement, has proven to be the most successful in linking the new arrivals to Judaism and the wider Jewish world. In fact, he says, at meetings of the World Congress of Russian Jews in Moscow, the Toronto approach has been called the most effective anywhere in the world outside of Israel.

For the past 20 years, Rabbi Zaltzman has been putting in practice a method expounded by the late Rabbi Menachem Schneersohn, one he says works well even for people with little or no prior knowledge of Judaism.

"We serve every Russian Jew at the level at which they're ready," he says.

It's not watered-down Judaism, it's not merely secular concerts and social activities, he said. It's also not encouraging Russians to attend established synagogues, where more often than not, they feel uncomfortable, almost like outsiders. It's traditional, authentic Judaism, but applied judiciously, he said.

And, according to statistics Rabbi Zaltzman readily cites, it appears to be working.

Over the past 20 years, he has arranged for 4,000 ritual circumcisions, most of them for adults. The oldest was for a gentleman of 78, while the one-day record is 13 brit milah. On one memorable occasion, three generations of one family underwent the rite, linking them by blood to the covenant of Israel. In that single day, a five-year old boy, his 28-year-old father and his 58-year-old grandfather experienced the brit milah together.

In that same 20-year span, the JRCC has arranged for 5,000 homes to receive kosher mezuzot, while at the last High Holy Days, six synagogues – three of which featured Russian-language sermons and Russian/Hebrew prayer books – hosted 7,000 worshippers.

Russian Jews turn to the JRCC for other life cycle events, like burials and weddings, and the centre also offers a variety of classes geared to the level of interest in the community.

The Russian community also operates the TJA Ohr Menachem Day School and while attendance is modest, it has been growing. The agency also publishes monthly magazines in Russian and English as well as calendars in both languages.

Rabbi Zaltzman believes by making Russians comfortable with religious practice in a friendly and familiar environment, their attachment to Judaism will grow over time. In 1981, when he proposed this approach to the established community, he was met by skepticism. With his beard and traditional garb, he was told he would scare off his clients, that "you're too religious," he recalled.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman

"Now I think they understand. At the time, established Jews said you have a nice idea, but we can't give money to an idea we don't think will work."

His goal was never to make Russian Jews into Lubavitchers, Rabbi Zaltzman said. In fact, in all that time, only a few dozen have gone on to a more observant lifestyle. His aim, he said, is "to bring Russian Jews the basics of Jewish life."

Altogether, the JRCC operates on a $4 million annual budget while the biggest allocation from the Federation came in at only $120,000," he said. "I don't think the Federation money is adequate,' he said. "I think our service to the community deserves more."

He thinks misperceptions about his agenda may be at play. "Yes, I have a beard, but that shouldn't stop them," he said.

UJA Federation spokesman Howard English said the Federation is "strongly committed to the JRCC and to building a strong relationship with the Russian Jewish community.

"The strength of that relationship was demonstrated more than ever this year by the increased participation of the Russian Jewish community in the UJA Federation annual campaign," English said. "The Russian community on its own raised over $60,000 towards the campaign and we want to use the strength of this relationship to maintain and improve services for the Russian Jewish community, and work as hard as we can to integrate [them] into full community life."

Immigration to Toronto from the Soviet Union has come in three waves. The first dates back to the 1970s when the FSU first opened its doors to large-scale Jewish emigration. That wave petered out around 1980 and during the 1980s second wave, numbers were relatively modest.

The 1990s saw a jump in immigration as the Soviet Union collapsed and more than one million Jews left. While most made aliyah to Israel, substantial numbers came to Canada.

Most who moved to Toronto settled into a narrow strip along the Bathurst corridor, from Finch to as far north as Major Mackenzie. The area is now home to numerous Russian delis, video stores, book shops and other small businesses that cater to Russian clientele.

Most hail originally from larger centres in the FSU, cities like Odessa, Moscow, St. Petersburg, Lvov and Kiev, said Maia Master, publisher of the Russian Express newspaper.

Considered on their own, Toronto's 40,000 Russian Jews would constitute Canada's third largest Jewish community, behind only Toronto and Montreal.

In the last few years, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) has been receiving 600 to 650 Russian families each year, said Mila Voihanski, the agency's executive director. About 40 per cent arrive via Israel.

Each wave of immigrants has faced a different attitude from the local Jewish community, Voihanski said. In the 1970s, their arrival was seen as vindicating a political movement to free Jews from Soviet oppression. By the 1980s, local agencies recognized that the new arrivals were not equipped with a knowledge of Jewish traditions and were finding it difficult to integrate into the wider community. JIAS and other agencies adopted various integration programs, only some of which were successful. The least promising ones were those that tried to force a Canadian style on the new arrivals, she said.

"There wasn't much understanding and there was not much community building," she added.

Attempts to bring the two communities closer together failed as cultural differences and a lack of motivation from both sides proved too difficult to overcome. Canadian Jews, she said, wanted Russians to attend synagogue and donate money to the local campaigns. But Russian Jews did not feel comfortable in Canadian synagogues, and in Russia, "charity was not something they were used to. They saw the Jewish community as powerful and expected more in terms of jobs and schooling," said Voihanski, herself an émigré from Lvov who arrived 28 years ago.

"The bridge was shaking," Voihanski said. "There wasn't much of a foundation."

In the 1980s, she continued, the established community expected the Russian arrivals to embrace the same values that motivated Canadian Jews. The Russians felt very Jewish, bur from a different perspective. They felt Jewish all their lives, but from a negative (discriminatory) perspective.

Coming from a secular society that persecuted them, it was difficult for Russians to perceive Jewish affiliation in terms of kashruth or synagogue observance. Most however, maintained a cultural and historic identification with Judaism, as well as a strong bond with the State of Israel where many had relatives, she said.

JIAS and the broader community has changed its attitude to the Russian community in the last years. Her appointment in itself is a signal of a change of heart in the establishment, Voihanski suggested.

As executive director, she has developed the philosophy that "if you empower the community and build it so it sees itself as equal partners, it will integrate and feel part of the Jewish community."

Today, there are several grass roots programs that attempt to bring the two sides closer together. The Beth Tzedec Congregation, for one, offers a large number of free tickets for the High Holy Days, and unlike the case in past years, newcomers are matched with host families who make the transition easier, she said.

Temple Kol Ami is also undertaking an outreach program, as is Canadian Young Judaea, and JIAS itself teams with other agencies to offer teen get-togethers, leadership development programs and holiday events.

Even on the fund-raising front, the Russian community is joining wider community efforts. The JRCC last year held an emergency campaign for Israel and raised $100,000 in a short period of time, a significant sum for people new to the fund-raising ethos.

Still, Voihanski hears stories that suggest the human nature that works to bring people together can also divide them. Russians who have been here since the 1970s are expressing resentment at the newest arrivals, saying they are receiving more from the community than they did and that the new arrivals are much choosier when it comes to accepting jobs. She also hears that new arrivals are socializing with non-Jewish Russians and are dating them. But she's been told a lot of Russians who have been here longer are now dating Canadian Jews. "You hear a lot of that," she said.

Master believes "Russian Jews would love to be part of the larger Jewish society. I don't think Jewish Canadian really want the Russian Jews, welcoming them...Even Jews who have been here for 25 years, most of their friends are Russian-speaking."

Symphony musician part of dissident generation

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff reporter

During the communist era, when competition between the former Soviet Union (FSU) and the West was rife, Russia was considered the West's equal, if not superior, in several areas of endeavour: the space program, military hardware, engineering, hockey (and other sports), and the arts.

To this day, Russian emigres are only too happy to cite the achievements in the area of high culture in their former homeland, where the popularity of ballet, classical music and theatre is much greater than in North America.

Senya Trubashnik

Russia's Jewish community played a large role in the development of the arts in the FSU and today Toronto has reaped some of the benefit of the emigration of that talent.

Senya Trubashnik, 65, is a product of the Russian culture "system," a system which spots talent early and pours enormous resources into the effort to develop and nurture it.

For 18 years, Trubashnik served as principal oboe of the Moscow Philharmonic. After leaving the FSU in the early 1970s, he took a similar position for five years with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra and then went on to an eight–year career with the Belgian National Orchestra.

Trubashnik's 12–year association with the Toronto Philharmonia orchestra came to an end recently, during which time he also recorded with the likes of David Oisler, Zubin Mehta, Leonard Bernstein and Yo-yo Ma.

Russians have carried on a love affair with classical music, Trubashnik explained. Moscow alone is home to 11 professional orchestras and 40 chamber ensembles, plus three operas, 30 drama companies and 25 museums.

Looking back on his formative years in the FSU, Trubashnik recalls that even though Russians "cannot eat, they go to see theatre and music."

Under communism, "money was not important, but moral, intellectual and cultural achievements were."

From the 1950s to the 1970s, Jews were heavily represented in the country's intellectual class, in cinema, music, painting, architecture, science and medicine. They excelled because in the climate of anti–Semitism that prevailed, Jews had to be better than their colleagues to succeed, Trubashnik said.

Instruction at the Moscow Conservatory was free, but competition to get in was fierce. Of the 700 who would apply, only eight would be admitted. Jews knew that for them to be among the select few, they would have be better than their gentile neighbours, so talented young musicians as young as six practised five to six hours a day, Trubashnik said.

Gifted musicians were streamed into an arts program in which they studied for a few hours in the morning and then would spend the afternoon receiving instruction and practising their music.

Yasha Milkis, who played with the St. Petersburg Philharmonic and went on to play as a violinist with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, conductor Rudolph Barshai, and cellist Yuli Turovsky are among the Jewish musicians produced by that system, as is violinist Michael Ziskin.

Trubashnik, who considers himself a member of the dissident generation that included Andrei Sakharov, Alexander Solzhenitsyn and Mstislav Rostropovich, had a successful career in Moscow when the first winds of change began blowing through the FSU.

His first run–in with the KGB came in 1968 when members of the Moscow orchestra were given copies of a book, The Truth About the Six–Day War, while on tour in Buenos Aires. The KGB learned of it and demanded the books be turned over. Trubashnik gave up one copy, keeping another.

On his return to Russia, he was caught with the offending book by a customs agent. That, he said, "started my trouble." He was prevented from playing a concert in the Kremlin, but in 1972 the musicians' defiance of Soviet authorities reached a head. The Moscow orchestra had been forbidden to play Dmitri Shostakovich's 13th Symphony, which had debuted in 1962 and which contained a Yevgeny Yevtushenko poem about Babi Yar. The poem described the mass execution of Kiev Jews by the Nazis but was also seen as highly critical of the Soviet Union.

"Bureaucrats wanted to stop the concert," Trubashnik recalled, but the conductor, Kyrill Kondrashin, refused. Mounted police were ordered to surround the theatre prior to the performance and 15 musicians buckled under the pressure and left.

Ninety remained and the performance went ahead as scheduled. A little while later, Trubashnik got a call from the KGB, accusing him of being bourgeois. Shortly after he was sent into exile, and forced to leave behind two apartments, a cottage, a car, 25 antique clocks, and paintings. He believes his profile and the fact his cousin, who worked for Sol Hurok's booking agency in New York, pulled some strings, saved him from a much worse fate.

Trubashnik doesn't regret his decision. "It was time," he now says. "It was time for a changing Russia. Gorbachev didn't come overnight. It came brick by brick and the 13th Symphony was the main catalyst in music."

Younger generation unlike their parents

But the younger generation, those who have spent more of their lives in Canada than in Russia, may be different. Her two oldest children, both teenagers, "are mentally all Canadian," she said.

Russians are different from Canadians psychologically, she continued. "You grew up in bigger extended families. You were free to express yourselves, to be yourself. We need a little bit of time to learn about ourselves and what we want to do."

Svetlana Iskanderova

Master believes most Russians "are coming back to their Jewish roots."

***

Svetlana Iskanderova is part of a young generation of Russian newcomers to Canada who feels comfortable in both worlds. Born in Tashkent 23 years ago, she arrived in Toronto at age 13. Her parents, Zelina and Alex, are unlike others of their generation in that they had some grounding in Jewish tradition and culture. Zelina, for one, speaks Yiddish well and is totally familiar with religious practices.

Most of Svetlana's friends are Jewish and though none are particularly observant, her 20 to 30 good friends "all want specifically a Jewish partner."

"This includes even those who just know they are Jews, who have been to synagogue only a couple of times in their lives. They just want someone with less differences," she said.

Svetlana, who has a Jewish husband, says she sees couples with children opting to have their sons circumcised, or hosting baby naming ceremonies, or choosing a traditional Jewish burial for loved ones.

"I see a lot of people in their 40s and 50s fall into religion," she said. But her age cohorts are too involved in building a career and starting their lives to concern themselves with that.

While her contemporaries retain a stubborn Jewish identity, Svetlana, who works as a switcher and editor at the Weather Network, acknowledges they are more comfortable socializing with other Russians and not with Canadian Jews. Besides the numerous questions Canadians ask about their lifestyle, Svetlana perceives major cultural barriers getting in the way of friendships. In school, she said, Russians tended to dress up, Canadian dress much more casually.

"From my perspective, we're far too aggressive for them. We strive for excellence, to get a good life, to try for

Emigre operates Russian-language paper

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff reporter

In a lot of ways, Maia Master is typically Canadian – hard working, ambitious, family oriented, and proud of her heritage.

Of course, Master is Canadian by choice, not by birth, having emigrated from Kishinev, Moldova (a former republic in the southwest of the Soviet Union) a little over 12 years ago.

For Master, as for many other Russian immigrants, leaving behind the familiar – if unfriendly – environment of her youth was a wrenching experience. The language was different, the food unfamiliar and the overall environment so disorienting it took her a long time to get used to it. She looks back on her first years in Toronto as something like "an illness."

"It was very stressful," she says. "It was one of the most stressful things in my life."

Although only 25 at the time, she found it difficult to integrate into her new environment. "It took me three years to feel comfortable on the street, and I was young."

The experience left her with an abiding sense of compassion for other immigrants, particularly older ones, whose lives have been thrown topsy-turvy by the move to Canada.

Master, who had a background as a nurse, had to find her feet in a society that didn't particularly value her Soviet education. Like many others, she was forced into a new occupation, an experience that only added to the disorientation she experienced. But with two small children to support and a marriage about to break up, she had no choice.

Her first job was as a sales manager for a small Russian-language newspaper in Toronto. It turned out to be a fortuitous career move as she immediately found she had an affinity for the newspaper business. Making sales and putting out a paper excited her.

Eventually she moved to another Russian paper to become manager of advertising. After a few years, during which she increased that paper's size 60-fold, she decided it was time to open her own publication.

Six years ago, she did so, launching the Russian Express, and she hasn't looked back. Today the weekly boasts almost 40,000 readers a week.

"I try to help immigrants integrate successfully in this society," she said. "We tell success stories, how to integrate to make themselves feel they're home."

With a staff of seven freelance writers and three full-time office staff, the paper covers the Toronto Russian scene, with only a smattering of reports from Russia. Page 4 is dedicated to Israeli news and the paper also features a columnist writing on Israeli issues.

Helps immigrants integrate into society

Despite the Israeli coverage, the readership of the paper goes beyond the area's Jewish population, and is geared to the increasing number of Russian speakers who continue to flock to Toronto, many of whom are not Jewish, Master said.

Russian Jews, she said, identify strongly with Israel, and the paper is not afraid to print letters from former Russian Israelis who complain about Israel's refusal to allow non-Jewish Russian servicemen to be buried in military cemeteries.

Besides being Zionist in orientation, the Russian community also has a strong sense of their Jewish identity, even if that doesn't manifest itself in religious observance, she said.

"Russian Jews are very proud to be Jewish.

"My generation wants to be more Jewish in this country. I want [my children] to celebrate Jewish holidays."

Like others from the FSU, Master did not have much exposure to a traditional Jewish life. "My grandmother and grandfather were killed by the Nazis so my mother was an orphan. She grew up in an orphan house with seven brothers and sisters.

"I didn't grow up with a grandmother to teach me Yiddish, how to light candles, what is Shabbat. I grew up in a communist country where religion was not allowed, so I didn't have a Jewish personality.

"I grew up in a Russian culture and language, but we always were Jewish and we dreamed to become better Jews."

Like earlier generations of Jewish immigrants, Russian Jews value education highly, she said. Also important are cultural pursuits like ballet, music and continuing education.

But, she said, "family is number one. They love to have a house. By the second or third year, they have a house. They want a castle for the family."

Russians also value career, and Master acknowledges that despite the difficulties for newcomers, "here you have more possibilities.

"I think Russian Jews are very busy people. We're very ambitious. We're so busy trying to achieve what you have for so long, we don't have time to socialize."

In the last five or six years, she continued, "I was so busy building my business, I was happy to have a few hours to spend with my family."

Her oldest, Anatole, 17, has his heart set on a career in the Canadian army while her daughter Susan, 15, is still in school. Her second daughter, Sarah Nicole, is less than two.

Master believes this generation is already more Canadian than Russian. "Mentally, they are Canadian."

She sees the same phenomenon elsewhere among Russian immigrants. Among the first wave of immigrants, who came 25 years ago, she said, you hear of many cases of parents who are proud of their son the lawyer or their daughter the teacher. "That's everywhere."

Her generation wants the same for themselves, and Master puts her own twist on an old Russian proverb that says "the first generation is good fertilizer for the new generation. We don't want to be fertilizer. We want to achieve something ourselves."

'Would be wonderful to make a bridge'

the best. Kids here seem to take it easy. Kids have had it all laid out for them."

What's more, she found that "Jewish kids were surprisingly less accepting" of Russians than non-Jews. The reason, she said, is "they were JAPs (spoiled)."

Canadian and Russian young people seemed to have different values, she continued. "All of us had totally different life experiences. I personally stood in lineups for bread and milk. When you start telling people that, Canadian Jews feel you came from the gutter."

Even when they party, Russians have different tastes, she continued. On a date, more than likely she and her friends will dress to the nines and will expect their escort to open doors, offer to pay and generally, "treat me like a woman."

Zelina Iskanderova, an adjunct associate professor at the University of Toronto's Institute for Aerospace Studies, says "it's a pity we don't have strong links with Canadian Jews. All of them have the same roots from one or two generations ago."

Russian and Canadian Jews "appreciate our heritage, traditions, our cultural roots. Our bubbies and zaydies suffered so much. I think it would be wonderful to make a bridge, to meet, to be more integrated in the Jewish community."

Double suicide bombings kill 23 in Tel Aviv

By HAIM SHADMI and JONATHAN LIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — Seventeen of the 23 people killed in Sunday night's double suicide bombing had been identified the next day – the victims included 12 Israelis and five foreigners.

As of early Monday afternoon, 43 of the approximately 100 people wounded in the attack were still hospitalized, Army Radio reported. Two were wounded critically, five seriously, two moderately to seriously, and the rest lightly to moderately.

The attack took place around 6:30 p.m. Sunday evening at the old central bus station in south Tel Aviv.

Part of the delay in identifying the other victims may be due to the difficulty of reaching family members of non-Israelis, some of whom live abroad or may be afraid to come forward. The victims include two citizens of Romania, one from Ghana and one Bulgarian.

Interior Minister Eli Yishai ordered immunity from prosecution for all foreign workers caught up in the attack. The immunity applies to anyone who requires treatment or comes to look for a friend or family member. Many foreign workers – some of them illegal – live in the area of the attack.

Television stations read police announcements in English, assuring illegal foreign workers that they would not be deported if they sought treatment or searched for friends and relatives in hospital.

The National Insurance Institute announced Monday that it will handle the funerals and transfer of the bodies abroad of five of the foreigners killed in the attack.

The two suicide bombers blew themselves up within less than a minute of one another, at the corner of G'dud Ha'ivri and Neve She'anan streets in south Tel Aviv.

Police spokesperson Gil Kleiman said the explosive devices used by the bombers were loaded with metal shards in order to maximize the destruction.

"From the extent of the damage on the scene... they were very strong explosive devices. In each case, metal fragments were added to the explosives to increase the amount of death," he said.

Islamic Jihad and Hamas took responsibility for the attack after some confusion over Fatah's involvement. The Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, the military wing of Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement, had taken responsibility for the attack Sunday, but Fatah denied any connection to it.

In a statement claiming responsibility, the Al-Aqsa Brigades identified the two bombers as Nablus residents Burak Hilsa and Samar A-Nuri. Fatah, however, said the men were not members of its organization.

The attack was the first suicide bombing in an Israeli city since November, when a suicide bomber blew up a bus in Jerusalem, killing himself and 11 passengers.

On July 17, 2002, two suicide bombers blew themselves up at the entrance to the Neve Sha'anan area in Tel Aviv, killing three people and wounding 40 others. On Jan. 25, 2002, 32 people were wounded in a suicide blast on Neve Sha'anan Street.

After bombing, Israel won't let PA attend London conference

By ALUF BENN and AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel rejected Britain's appeal Monday to reconsider an Israeli decision to keep the Palestinian delegation away from a London conference about reforms in the Palestinian Authority (PA).

In a telephone conversation early Monday afternoon, British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw asked Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to reconsider the decision, which was made in reaction to Sunday night's double suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, but Netanyahu was not receptive.

Netanyahu told Straw that Britain was causing a "reverse effect" by focusing on allowing terrorists to attend the conference instead of focusing on fighting terror, Israeli news sources reported. He said Israel was adopting U.S. President George W. Bush's premise that people who have been involved with terror can't be part of any process, and that PA President Yasser Arafat needs to make reforms at home, not in London.

The government's decision was not aimed at Britain, which initiated the conference, Netanyahu added, but was a measure being taken against the Palestinian Authority.

Straw said Israel was the one creating the reverse effect and that instead of concentrating on terror, Israel was keeping back those Palestinians interested in reform.

The decision not to allow the delegates to attend the conference was made during a Sunday night meeting in which senior Israeli ministers weighed the government's response to the Tel Aviv bombing that killed 23 people.

Israel also decided to prevent Palestinians from attending the PLO central council meeting to be held Thursday in Ramallah, which was scheduled to approve the Palestinian constitution. Other decisions included closing three Islamic academies and restricting the movements of Palestinian leaders and travel by Palestinian civilians.

In addition, Israel reserved the right not to transfer money to the Palestinian Authority and decided to conduct several military operations.

In southern Gaza Sunday night, Israeli attack helicopters fired missiles at what the army said was a weapons factory that manufactured mostly mortars, Israel Radio reported. Palestinian sources reported that a second building was hit as well, and that the blasts wounded eight people and cut off electricity.

Attending the security meeting Sunday night were Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Internal Security Minister Uzi Landau and Finance Minister Silvan Shalom.

Labor party chair Amram Mitzna said in reponse to the attack that Israel's security policy should be changed in order to better prevent such attacks.

"At this difficult hour, my heart is with the families and the wounded," Mitzna said. "I am determined to change Israel's security policy so that we can mercilessly hit murderers and those who send them, while establishing a separation fence that will serve as a defensive shield between us and the terror."

U.S. President George W. Bush condemned the attack, adding that he would not allow this to bring recent peace moves to a halt.

The PA also condemned the suicide bombings as a "terrorist" attack and said it would act against those behind it. In addition, the PA called for the international community to intervene to let Palestinian security forces take action.

Israeli economy in a tailspin

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli motorists got a chance this week to join the rest of the industrialized world and drive on a multi-lane toll road.

The four-lane "Trans-Israel" highway, which bypasses the jammed freeways near Tel Aviv, opened a few months ago on a free trial basis.

But on its first day of operation as a toll road – about $2.50 (US) to travel some 20 miles – the road was virtually empty.

It may be that Israelis will need time to get used to paying for what was once free. Or it may well be another indication of the hard economic times that plague the country.

Put simply, 2002 was a terrible year for the Israeli economy. Thousands were laid off and unemployment reached a record high of 10.5 per cent.

During the past two years, 81,000 people fell below the poverty line. About 1.3 million Israelis – nearly one in five – are now poor. The poverty level for an Israeli family of four is $934 (US) per month.

According to preliminary figures released last week by the Central Bureau of Statistics, Israel's economy in 2002 had its worst performance since 1953.

The economy shrank by one per cent this year, according to the bureau. Moreover, it was the second year in a row that the adjusted gross domestic product fell, a first in the nation's history, according to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

Nor are there signs of improvement on the horizon: an official at the bureau predicted that if current trends continue, the economy will fall by as much as 0.5 per cent next year.

Helping to create the economic downturn, private consumption declined by 0.6 per cent this year, according to the bureau, which said it was the first such decrease since 1980.

The climate among producers was equally bleak: some 60 factories and 150 start-up companies shut down during the past year. Another round of closings will take place next year, according to the Manufacturers Association.

Along with the thousands of businesses that closed, the salaries of wage earners declined.

The tourism business was equally bleak. The number of hotel stays dropped by 34 per cent from 2001, and hoteliers reported a decrease in income of 75 per cent.

There is more bad economic news in store for Israelis in the coming year.

Gasoline prices are expected to rise, as are the prices of food and manufactured goods such as electrical appliances.

Moreover, according to new tax provisions, interest and dividends will be subject to taxation for the first time in Israel's history.

It's no surprise that many Israelis are thinking twice before opening their wallets.

Adding to the gloom, the governor of the Bank of Israel, David Klein, said in an interview two weeks ago with the Ma'ariv newspaper that given the current economic climate, it would not be surprising if a major Israeli bank collapsed.

Klein's comments caused the shekel to drop one per cent against the dollar in weekend options trading.

Early last week, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon reprimanded Klein for his pessimistic comments.

Without doubt, some of the economy's decline can be attributed to a wider slowdown affecting the global economy. Israel, a leader in global high-tech, was especially hard hit when the dot-com bubble burst.

But the main factor is the two-year-old conflict with the Palestinians, which has kept tourists and investors away.

Economic analysts agree that only an end to the fighting will allow for renewed economic growth.

Meanwhile, analysts are warning that if the economic situation continues this way, the country's social stability could be at stake.

But less than a month before general elections, there is no comprehensive plan to rescue the Israeli economy.

For their part, Israeli news organizations are not dealing with the issue. They are preoccupied with the election campaign and the near-daily casualties from the fighting with the Palestinians.

For now, one can merely point out the large question marks that will affect the economy:

- The war climate: Will there be a clear outcome soon to the U.S. campaign against Iraq and Israel's war against Palestinian terrorism?
- Israel's budget: Will the next finance minister push for massive investments in infrastructure as part of efforts to renew economic growth, or will cutbacks remain the policy, out of fear of even worse times to come?
- World economy: Will the global economy recover, allowing Israel to regain some of the high-tech strength it lost during the past three years?

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest .

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2003 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 21, 2003. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 28, 2003.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 13, 2003. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Hezbollah says Tannenbaum is alive

By DANIEL SOBELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hezbollah Secretary-General Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah said Sunday that Israeli civilian Elchanan Tannenbaum, who was kidnapped by Hezbollah in October 2000, is alive.

In an interview on a Lebanese radio station, Nasrallah repeated that the Iranian-backed terrorist group is holding "four prisoners, one of whom is known to be alive – the Israeli colonel Tannenbaum – and three whose fate is unknown."

Also in October 2000, Hezbollah kidnapped three Israel Defence Forces (IDF) soldiers during a carefully orchestrated operation in Israel just over the Lebanese border. The three – staff sergeants Omar Suwad and Benyamin Avraham, and Sergeant Adi Avitan – were later declared dead by the IDF.

Nasrallah's comments marked the first time since the Hezbollah leader announced the abduction, on Oct. 15, 2000, that he has said Tannenbaum is alive. Tannenbaum's family says he suffers from health problems that require regular medication.

In the original kidnapping announcement, Nasrallah claimed that Tanenbaum was not abducted, but was tricked into coming to Beirut on his own.

Nasrallah estimated that an exchange of prisoners with Israel is not one of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's priorities at the moment, since "the numbers proposed are not in line with previous attempts to reach an agreement for a prisoner exchange." Nasrallah predicted that Hezbollah "will hear different numbers" and "something new will happen in the foreseeable future."

Belgium reopens murder case of super-gun scientist

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — The Belgian State Prosecutor is considering re-opening a probe into the murder of Canadian scientist Gerald Bull in Brussels 12 years ago, amid new suspicions that the Mossad was responsible.

Last Friday, the Belgian daily Derniere Heure published a report saying Belgian police and the State Prosecutor have new information from a "reliable source" that identified a Mossad agent, a member of an "elite unit," as one of Bull's assassins.

The report said the source of the information is in a Central American country "previously controlled by Britain," most likely Belize. The source said a piece of jewelry or a bracelet was taken from Bull and kept by the suspect.

The magistrate appointed to investigate the case is considering sending a Belgian team to the Central American country to examine the evidence. Israel sources said they had not received any official or unofficial requests from Belgium on the matter.

Bull, a Canadian-born astrophysicist and metallurgist, worked for the Canadian Defence Ministry and for the United States during the 1960s on a project to build a cannon powerful enough to launch satellites into space. From 1980, he lived in Brussels and offered consulting services to the artillery corps of different countries.

When Bull offered his services to Israel, he was turned down. During the early 1980s, he was hired by Iraq to help develop a mega-cannon capable of firing a huge projectile at a distance of 1,500 kilometres. Iraq was at war with Iran at the time.

On March 22, 1990, Bull was shot dead from close range at the entrance to his home. The two assassins escaped without taking his briefcase or any of the documents and jewelry he was carrying.

Arms from Iraq caused blast at Hezbollah base

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Western intelligence analysts believe that last Monday's explosion at a Hezbollah base in Lebanon's Bekaa Valley resulted from the use of weapons smuggled from Iraq.

The precise character of the weapon remains unclear.

Following the explosion, Lebanese sources reported on a strong blast at a Hezbollah training base near the town of Jinta. Hezbollah closed off the area and barred media crews from entering. Ambulances approached the town, but it is not clear whether their crews treated any wounded. At this stage, the number of persons hurt by the explosion remains unknown.

Hezbollah often follows a policy of withholding information about casualties. This was its standard policy during its years of warfare against the Israel Defence Forces in southern Lebanon.

Western intelligence experts believe the explosion was connected to an Iraqi arms shipment that reached Hezbollah a few days before last week's blast. Two different explanations might account for the explosion. According to one theory, it resulted from a test that Hezbollah conducted with one of the weapons, perhaps a trial missile launch. Alternatively, a mishap might have occurred when Hezbollah tried to store the arms in a bunker.

Last week, Ha'aretz reported that Iraq gave Hezbollah medium-range missiles. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said last week that Israel believes Iraq also transferred chemical and biological weapons to Syria in order to keep them from the attention of United Nations inspectors. The claim that Baghdad is hiding non-conventional weapons in Syria is being investigated, but it has yet to be verified conclusively, a senior Israeli security official said late last week.

In addition to receiving weapons from Iraq, Hezbollah has also received stepped-up arms shipments from Syria. Damascus has given Hezbollah Syrian-made missiles whose range is comparable to that of the Iranian missiles already in the organization's possession. Several hundred missiles have been sent to Hezbollah by both Syria and Iran. The Israeli official said, "Hafez Assad would roll over in his grave if he could see the nature of the ties that his son, President Bashar Assad, has forged with the Iranians."

Israeli officials accuse Syria of continuing to foment Palestinian terror against Israel, charging that the Syrians allow terror organizations to operate freely in Damascus. Israeli officials also accuse Syria of using Hezbollah as a means of pressuring Jerusalem, noting that Damascus has thwarted efforts by the Lebanese army to deploy troops in the south of the country in compliance with UN Security Council Resolution 425. In so doing, Syria has undermined efforts to allay tensions on the northern border, Israel charges.

An IDF investigation of a terror attack near Kibbutz Metzuba in the western Galilee last March, in which six Israelis were killed, has established that the strike was perpetrated by two Palestinian residents of Lebanon who belong to Islamic Jihad. But the pair was sent out on the attack by Hezbollah, which also trained them and provided firearms and the ladder they used to scale the electronic border fence, the army says.

Hezbollah has denied involvement in the attack, apparently out of concern for its credibility among Lebanon's public: while many Lebanese view attacks in the Har Dov region as legitimate, this attack occured outside that region, and might thus have been considered illegitimate. Nevertheless, Israeli officials have no doubts about Hezbollah's link to the attack.

So far, however, Israel is certain about the identity of only one of the assailants. Though Israel ensured that photographs of the terrorists' corpses would be published in Lebanese newspapers in the hopes that relatives would identify the bodies, to date it has only received reliable information on the identity of one of the two. Hezbollah continues to conceal the identities of the two men from their families.

Information that has reached Israel's security establishment also indicates that a senior Al Qaeda operative is actively recruiting men from this region for the organization. An Israeli security official said that this recruiter, one of Al Qaeda's top six members, recently visited Jordan, Syria and Lebanon in an effort to win new recruits for Osama bin Laden's organization. Al Qaeda's core group, the Israeli official said, continues to operate on the Afghanistan-Pakistan border, but orders are sent out from there to points throughout the Middle East, including Saudi Arabia, Yemen and Lebanon.

Al Qaeda also recently started to operate terror cells in the Gaza Strip. These cells are comprised of Palestinians from Gaza. Most of them were previously affiliated with Islamic Jihad, but some may have been associated with Fatah's "popular committees." The cells receive orders from sources in Lebanon. Their members have apparently already been involved in shooting attacks in the Gaza Strip and are thought to be drawing up plans for larger-scale attacks. Recently, Israeli security officials say, there has been a noticeable rise in the number of threats by Al Qaeda men against Israeli and Jewish targets in Israel and overseas.

• The terms of Israel's two top diplomats at the United Nations came to an end. Israel's ambassador Yehuda Lancry was replaced by Dan Gillerman, head of Israel's chamber of commerce. Deputy ambassador Aaron Jacob, was succeeded by Arye Mekel.

Dec. 31

Jan. 1

• The scandal surrounding alleged vote-buying in the recent Likud primaries continues to cut into the Likud Party's lead in the upcoming election, but the party is still poised to win the most seats of any party in the Jan. 28 vote. A survey by Ha'aretz had Likud winning 31 seats, while a Ma'ariv poll had Likud winning 34 seats. The two polls forecast that Labor would win 22 and 21 seats, respectively.

Jan. 2

• Researchers from the Technion and Rambam Hospital in Haifa succeeded in creating heart tissues from fetal stem cells. They said the tissues could be used as a model to check how certain medicines affect the heart organ.

Jan. 3

• The Central Election Committee ruled that 27 parties may compete for seats in the Jan. 28 election for the 16th Knesset. Two parties, Balad and Gesher, were denied approval. Balad, and its leader MK Azmi Bishara, disqualified earlier in the week, are appealing the decision to the High Court.

Another year, another New Year's resolution. If you've become accustomed to making them and seeing them melt away faster than the spring snow, don't despair ... there IS a way to make this year different from all other years. At Positive Changes Hypnosis, thousands of satisfied clients are achieving the results that had previously eluded them. How does Positive Changes succeed where other methods fail? Here is one person's story.

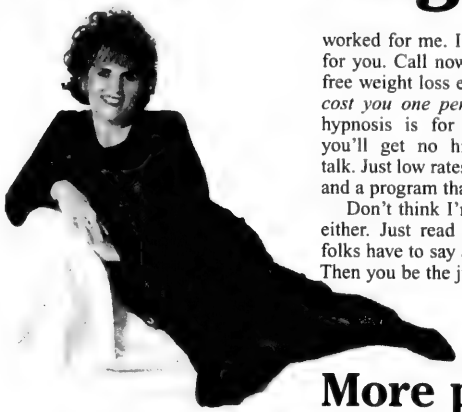
My name is Patricia Carley. I'm a civil servant, homemaker and grandmother. Amazing as it seems, I lost 108 pounds of fat with hypnosis. It was easy and fun. This is my true story.

I came into the world at five pounds. I was overweight from there.

With a name like Pat, which rhymes with FAT, I was the brunt of cruel jokes. I had no friends. Never developed self-esteem.

The Diet Rollercoaster

I went on every crazy weight loss scheme. Tried the grapefruit, egg, special soup, all protein, all vegetable, only starch, high fiber and all fruit diets. Spent a fortune on tasteless prepackaged food. Went to support groups. Starved on protein shakes. I even guzzled down straight vinegar, praying it would help me lose weight. The result was always the same. I'd lose weight slowly, then quickly gain it back, plus more. I was ashamed and embarrassed.



Pat Carley AFTER hypnosis – 108 pounds lighter

Instant Results

I was amazed by the change after my first hypnosis session. My brain got the message to zap my appetite. Hypnosis gave me instant control over my eating habits. My cravings came to a dead halt. My confidence and self-esteem soared. My fat melted off at an average of 3.5 pounds a week.

I received so many benefits from hypnosis, I could write a book. No more headaches, cravings, binges, bloating or weight gain. I'm more confident at work. I feel alive, vibrant, active and energetic. I'm in tune with my feelings. I have never felt better emotionally, mentally and physically.

Losing my weight with hypnosis is the best experience I ever had. It worked for me. I know it can work for you. Call now to schedule your free weight loss evaluation. It won't cost you one penny to find out if hypnosis is for you. I guarantee you'll get no high-pressure sales talk. Just low rates, excellent service and a program that works.

Don't think I'm an isolated case either. Just read what a few other folks have to say about their results. Then you be the judge.

More proof...

Physician stops snacking!

"I lost 5 lbs. in the first week. It's been very easy and the weight loss has been steady. I stopped snacking after dinner.... I used to feel out of control. I felt guilty that I couldn't control my eating habits, even though, as a physician, I knew how it would affect my health. Now, with hypnosis, I feel so much more in control."

— Brownen Gates, Anesthetist, Sunnybrook Hospital

Two years without smoking!

"Thanks to hypnosis I have been a non-smoker for two years! I stopped instantly. The easiest way to go is hypnosis!"

— Susan Cooper, Housewife

First month brings success!

"My weight loss was out of control, my stress level high, my nights were sleepless....I have been going there for over 1 month only strange things started to happen — 10 lbs. have dropped! I sleep at night! My staff tells me that I seem nicer and wonders what happened!"

— Bettina Roth, Managing Director

Will 2003 be just another year of unfulfilled New Year's resolutions — or the year you finally KEEP one? You decide.

Y.I.D. chronicles tensions between Canadian-born and Israeli-born Jews

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

The best documentaries reveal all the angles and perspectives on an issue. Two students took that principle to heart in the fascinating film Y.I.D. (Yehudeem in the Diaspora) about tension between and Israeli-born and Canadian-born Jews in Canada in the face of Israeli-Palestinian hostilities.

More than 140 people attended a recent private screening of the film at Rondo Banquet Hall in Thornhill, where 30 people were turned away at the door (tickets had to be pre-purchased). The buzz was understandable: the controversial Y.I.D. rattles cages.

The documentary, produced by Chutzpah Productions under the direction of 25-year-old Igal Hecht and 23-year-old Ron Furman, follows Israeli-born and Canadian-born Jews from January 2001 to October 2002 and covers events such as the pro-Israel rally in Ottawa and a number of pro-Israel demonstrations in Toronto.

It will have its first public showing at the upcoming Toronto Jewish Film Festival,

The film's most revealing moments came during its 38 one-on-one interviews.

One recurring character is a angry young Israeli who is not afraid to speak his mind.

The 24-year-old sparkplug of the film, Matan Rabin, tells the camera, "Jews hate Israelis… They think we're macho, pushy, have a lot of chutzpah." More than once, Rabin is shot in front of a North York Country Style donut shop, spouting vitriolic statements between cigarette puffs. His candour about Canadian-Israeli relations breathes life into an already well-done film.

The Bathurst and Steeles area of Toronto figures prominently in Y.I.D., as grainy shots from car windows capture the rain-soaked intersection. Local residents will chuckle at angled shots of Pride of Israel Synagogue and G. Ross Lord Park.

In the film, the ultimate sign of overseas support – an Israeli flag attached to car doors – becomes a symbol of solidarity. Yet the tone of the piece is more accusatory than neutral: the film hints that Canadians alienate themselves from Israel, and Israelis, by refusing to make aliyah and to donate sufficient funds to UJA and elsewhere.

Yet the documentary never focuses on the Israeli perspective long enough to become too biased, as quick cuts to alternative opinions give the film integrity.

Hecht and Furman cleverly juxtapose North American scenes and Israeli ones — scenes of davening at a Toronto synagogue cut to davening at the Western Wall, and supermarket shots from Thornhill cut to a bustling market in Jerusalem.

But Y.I.D.'s core ideas are expressed more in words than in scenes. A student making aliyah is adamant about his support for the State of Israel: "I'm doing my part because I'm not a hypocrite," says Raffi Kats.

The scene then shifts to a York University student explaining why she has repeatedly turned down free Birthright Israel trips: "I'm not going to risk my life to support Israelis by visiting their country."

The film also includes interviews with Canadian Jewish leaders such as Canadian Jewish Congress head Keith Landy and Zac Kaye of Jewish Campus Services.

But their comments feel PR-ish compared to the heartfelt, man-on-the-street comments from ordinary Jews.

Against the backdrop of Sobey's supermarket, a real estate agent criticizes the stance taken by some Canadian Jews when complaining about Israelis who leave their homeland: "Who are we to tell them to stay there when we're not there?" she asks, shrugging her shoulders.

A York student comes up with one of the film's more poignant lines, saying that Israel is "a good issue to support from far away."

Over and over, Y.I.D. returns to Rabin for quotes that only he can provide. "I'm caught between two walls," he says, explaining that coming to Canada forced him to adapt to a new country, yet his heart remains in Israel. "If I leave [Canada], it will be hard," he adds, his jovial face turning solemn.

Sadly, documenting the distance between Israeli-born and Canadian-born Jews wasn't difficult.

For instance, a trip to York University reveals two separate rooms for the Israeli student association and the Jewish student group.

Indeed, Hecht says the idea for Y.I.D came to him during a night at Country Style — where Canadian-born Jews were huddled in one booth, while the Israelis whom they knew chatted in another across the shop.

But filming moments of solidarity made for an an effective conclusion, leaving viewers hopeful that relations won't remain so poor.

At the pro-Israel rally in Ottawa last April, the camera pans over Israeli flags, dance circles and waving hands.

In a more tender scene, the camera catches Rabin and his friends locking arms and shouting "Am Israel Chai!"

It would have been helpful if the documentary included more of these moments, since it generally paints a bleaker picture of Canadian-born Jews pitted against Israeli-born Jews.

But as their company name suggests, Hecht and Furman have a lot of chutzpah. They are not afraid to shine the spotlight on problems, and Y.I.D excellently sums up the tension many Jews know about, but never discuss.

It's this boldness that marks the documentary as an original that is destined for wider acclaim.

Duo gives classic Israeli, klezmer tunes a contemporary touch

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Most Thursday afternoons you'll find klezmer musicians Brian Katz and Martin van de Ven practising together at Katz's west-end apartment, which has a panoramic view of downtown Toronto.

One Thursday, however, the musical instruments don't come out of their cases. They are eager to talk about their new CD, Collected Stories, featuring van de Ven on clarinet and Katz on classical guitar and piano.

The duo will be performing Jan. 12 at 8 p.m. at Israel's Judaica Centre (897 Eglinton Ave. W.) as part of Israel's literature and music series.

The 12 tracks on Collected Stories include klezmer and Israeli classics, as well as original compositions. The pairing of guitar and clarinet, a rare combination, accentuates the contemporary interpretation of many of the arrangements. While drawing on a wide array of folk traditions —Yiddish, Israeli, Armenian, Bulgarian and North African — the duo modernizes the familiar melodies with jazz improvisations and unusual rhythms.

Brian Katz and Martin van de Ven.

For example, in Don't Worry You Can't Fall Off the Floor, the Bulgarian dance music of the clarinet is offset by multiple rhythms that give the song an African flavour. And jazz riffs give Yiddish classics like Rozhinkes Mit Mandlen (Raisins and Almonds) and Mayn Steytele Belz (My Little Town Belz) a contemporary feel.

Guest violinist Monique Lansdorp joins the duo for Gankino Oro, a relatively newly composition rooted in traditional Bulgarian folk dance music. She also plays in the spirited rendition of Turkishe Yales V'Yove Tants – Hey Par (Turkish Holy Day Prayer Dance – Hey Dance), based on the traditional klezmer slow-medium-fast dance suites.

Katz and van de Ven had been collaborating on musical projects over a period of seven years, but Collected Stories is the first CD they have made together. They met through local klezmer music circles in Toronto. Katz had been performing Hertzedic Lieder (Heart Songs) with Yiddish vocalist Allan Merovitz.

Van de Ven was one of the original members of the Flying Bulgars, one of the first bands in Toronto to play klezmer professionally as part of the klezmer revival. Katz was never an official member of the band, but often sat in for their piano player.

Both musicians have graduate degrees in music and backgrounds in classical, jazz and improvisation. Both found themselves moved by klezmer music.

"I grew up listening to klezmer and Yiddish music — famous performers like Molly Picon and Abe Schwartz," Katz recalls. "I remember dancing along and acting along to Molly Picon records."

He went on to perform many of these songs when he played at weddings and bar mitzvahs. However, his interest in Yiddish music was actually rekindled after he heard Merovitz sing many of the Yiddish classics.

Van de Van immigrated from the Netherlands with his parents in 1977. Later, as a performer, he played with different groups, finding himself drawn to klezmer. After leaving the Bulgars, he went to perform in Holland.

At about the same time, Katz was touring there with Merovitz. Van de Ven joined them in some of their performances.

Van de Ven says he had wanted to play with a guitarist. "I walked around with this idea that I wanted to do a duo with a guitarist."After performing with Katz, he realized the "musical chemistry was right," for ongoing collaboration, he says.

"There was instant communication when we were performing. It's very rare. The music that came out was very interesting because there was this instant rapport. Our rhythmic sense is instinctive. That's the basis from where other things grow."

They draw on different skills for their collaboration, Katz notes. "Martin has been doing more eastern music. I have more of a jazz background."

Klezmer music is very popular in Europe, particularly in Germany, Katz notes. However, he says that the appeal of Yiddish for many world music enthusiasts is its link to so many musical traditions.

"Because Jews lived in many places, they integrated their culture with the indigenous music." Katz says. "Klezmer is an amalgamation of many cultures. If you're going to get involved in the music of different cultures, you will find a wealth of musical cultures in Jewish music."

David Broza puts on explosive performance

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

He half sits, half stands at the edge of the stool and grips his guitar tightly, with one hand around the neck and the other hand opening and closing quickly over the strings in a pulsating rhythm.

He plucks hard. He shakes his instrument. His eyes are closed, his mouth is open, his head is thrown back.

His fingers fly furiously across the fretboard, only stopping abruptly at the end of the song, when he throws his arm out and holds it there until the audience's applause and cheers have died down and he's onto the next pulsating rhythm.

The theatrical style – partly conscious showman, partly passionate artist – is vintage David Broza. The popular Israeli guitarist and singer/songwriter who has been performing for over two decades and has recorded 19 albums in English, Hebrew and Spanish, was here recently for the third consecutive year as part of the Koffler School of Music's 2002-2003 concert series.

David Broza

Though Broza began the evening at the Leah Posluns Theatre with an explosive performance of Longing (from the album Big Secrets), at other times his music was steadier and more contemplative, with mellow versions of Crying to the Walls, Ramito De Violetas and a tongue-in-cheek rendition of middle American blues.

It would have been nice to hear some newer songs – the single All or Nothing, the title track from his latest album, was the only new song he played in the set – but his well-known hits proved that newer isn't necessarily better.

This was especially true with his poignant encore performance of Yehiyeh Tov (Things Will Be Better), the peace anthem he co-wrote with Jonathan Geffen 25 years ago when Egyptian president Anwar Sadat first visited Israel.

"I'm sick of it," he joked before he began. But whether he meant that he was sick of playing the same song for 25 years or that he was sick of needing to play that song for 25 years wasn't clear.

Either way, the audience wasn't sick of it. They sang along as if in prayer to a timeless, feel-good classic that, in light of the current intifadah and brewing international conflict, is more powerful today than it has ever been.

***

In addition to its annual concert series, the Koffler School of Music, which recently partnered with the Royal Conservatory of Music, offers music education to people of all ages. The final concert for the 2002-2003 season, pianist Shai Wosner, will be held on Thursday, Jan. 23 in conjunction with Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University. Last March, the Julliard-educated Wosner performed in a duo and solo concert with Palestinian pianist Abboud Ashkar to much critical acclaim.

Sondra Gotlieb amuses with her numerous addictions

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The title of Sondra Gotlieb's latest book, Dogs, Houses, Gardens, Food and Other Addictions, is an accurate summary of its contents, and only a writer as comically gifted as Gotlieb could turn this seeming dross into gold.

A native Winnipegger who became the famous "wife of" a Canadian diplomat, Gotlieb is deliciously self-mocking and funny as she describes many episodes related to her various addictions. Although she is also maddingly self-indulgent, she never fails to win us over, like a brilliantly devilish gossip at a dinner party.

Gotlieb's love affair with food began when her future husband took her out to a French restaurant. "Allan handed me a spoonful of his first dish – oeufs en meurette – and I knew at that moment that I would never again follow my mother's instructions and order the cheapest thing on the menu, as she had told me to do when on a date."

She subsequently devotes many pages to her food obsession, and astonishes us with her Proustian ability to recollect lunches, dinners, sauces, fragrances, tastes, recipes and culinary secrets from decades past.

The book stretches from her early Winnipeg days through her and her husband's postings in Ottawa, Washington, Europe and Toronto, focusing upon a parade of dogs, houses, gardens and gastronomical adventures experienced along the way.

"Other addictions" must certainly be a coy reference to sex – Gotlieb does not shy away from describing the most intimate occurrences of her nuptial bed – as well as to her penchant for commercial delights such as Judith Lieber purses. Fashionable among Washington socialites in the 1980s, the purses retailed for between $3,000 and $15,000 (US); somehow, the author resisted the temptation to buy one.

Gotlieb has a delightfully observant eye. Admiring the elegant and gleaming butcher shops of Geneva, she writes: "When I saw these shops, I at first had no idea what I was looking at. The Genevois display their meats like they display their jewellery. Visiting a butcher shop was for me like visiting Piaget or Vacherin-Constantin."

She also has a novel way of turning a phrase. For instance, readers may be forgiven for suspecting that a chapter called "The Squalid Brown Patch" would have something to do with dogs, or perhaps the "projectile vomiting" described so colourfully in a previous chapter. Instead, "The Squalid Brown Patch" opens the discussion of gardening that blooms so prolifically in the second half of the book.

Gotlieb unabashedly shares many details of a privileged life, and her pages are populated with an unceasing array of bigwigs, ladies of the diplomatic corps, celebrities, nannies, dressmakers, chauffeurs, butlers, maids and other service people. Her prose sparkles like a gurgling brook in the bright morning sun.

Kay Graham, the late publisher of the Washington Post, was a regular at the Gotliebs' famous table during the couple's Washington years. "Of all the embassies I have ever been to, the Gotliebs were the only one to run an intellectual salon," she once said. "I was never bored at their embassy and would always have good conversation. That's why I never refused an invitation."

It's precisely these qualities that make Dogs, Houses, Gardens, Food & Other Addictions an enjoyable read, even for those who have first encountered some of its chapters in the National Post, where Gotlieb is a regular columnist. The book is published by McArthur & Co. and sells for $29.95.

THE WAGON DRIVER

This story comes from Eastern Europe. It may even be true!

The rickety wagon creaked and groaned as it bounced along the dirt path to Pinsk. Yankel, the driver, had been driving the venerable Rabbi Lebov from town to town for over 20 years now. Rabbi Lebov would give a scholarly discourse at every town they visited, and would answer the townspeople's questions. The townspeople, seeing Rabbi Lebov's scholarship, would give him food to eat, which he would split with Yankel. But they could not be expected to support him forever. So on they would go to the next town....

"Rabbi," Yankel said to Rabbi Lebov, "I've been listening to you give your speech for so long that I know it by heart. Why I even know how to answer the questions the people ask afterwards. Why don't we switch places at the next town. You drive the wagon and I'll speak!"

Rabbi Lebov was reluctant to go through with Yankel's proposal. "Even if you do know the speech, how do you know you'll be able to answer all the questions the townspeople ask?"

"Rabbi, try me!" Yankel recited the Rabbi's speech verbatim, and Rabbi Lebov unleashed a barrage of questions. When Yankel answered them all, Rabbi Lebov begrudgingly agreed. A crowd gathered around the rickety wagon to hear Rabbi Lebov's wisdom.

Only it wasn't Rabbi Lebov speaking. Rabbi Lebov was sitting in front of the wagon, a whip in his hand, watching Yankel, dressed as a rabbi, say the speech he knew so well. The wagon driver was saying it well, he had to admit.

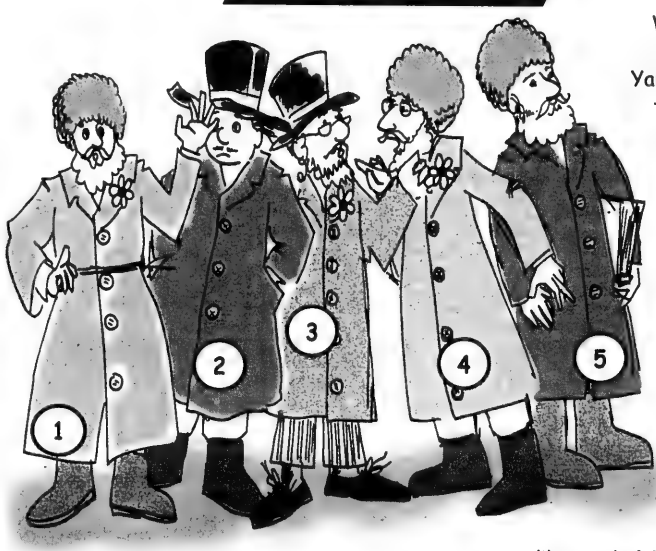
But now the speech was ending, and the people would start asking questions. Rabbi Lebov looked down, and hoped Yankel wouldn't make a fool out of himself.

Rabbi Lebov braced himself as Yankel received the first question. It was one the Rabbi himself had received many a time. Yankel skillfully answered it. A second question was put forward, and again Yankel wisely responded. He did the same for the third, for the fourth. Rabbi Lebov relaxed. This wasn't going to be as bad as he thought.

Just then a young man put forth the most complicated question Rabbi Lebov had ever heard in his life. Never in his entire career had he ever had to face so difficult a question. Oh no. What would Yankel do?

Yankel glared at the young questioner before him. "What kind of question is that?" he demanded. "You call that a question! Even my wagon driver knows the answer to that question! Yankel!" he continued, addressing Rabbi Lebov. "Tell him the answer!" And Rabbi Lebov was only too happy to comply.

LOGIC PUZZLE



We don't know who's the real Yankel and who's the real Rabbi Lebov! But if you can solve the clues below you'll figure it out!

A. The real Rabbi Lebov has 4 buttons on his coat.

B. Yankel has a flower in his lapel.

C. Rabbi Lebov is not standing at either end of the line.

D. Rabbi Lebov is wearing a fur hat.

E. Yankel is wearing boots.

Program helps teens face effects of intifadah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Adults find it difficult to cope with the tense situation in Israel, but it's even more difficult for teenagers who are also facing issues associated with adolescence, not to mention more serious problems.

Retorno, a four-year-old organization based in Givat Shemesh, Israel, that treats Orthodox youth (aged 13 to 18) and adults with drug and alcohol addictions, eating disorders or compulsive behaviours, is trying to help.

Retorno's Rabbi Micha Peled and his wife Brocha were in Toronto recently to promote awareness and raise funds for a new Retorno program: a series of camps to help teenagers cope with the effects of the intifadah.

Adults, Rabbi Peled said, find ways to cope with the situation in Israel. Teens, however, are "up and down anyway, and the intifadah makes it even harder to cope with life and go on with normal day-to-day activities."

As a result, he said, "kids at risk are more at risk, and kids who wouldn't normally be at risk, now are." Youngsters are afraid, he said, and they look for an escape route from their fears.

For the past two years, Retorno, which has branches in North, South and Central America, has been running four-day seminars in Israel that Rabbi Peled described as "therapy camps."

These camps, located near Givat Shemesh on "a beautiful site that is very conducive to calming," combines counselling, therapy and recreation. "The kids can go horseback riding, use a gym, and take hikes – it is a change from a stressful place."

Many of the participants have been touched by the ongoing terrorism, Rabbi Peled said. Even if they themselves haven't been personally affected, the situation is all around them.

There are also workshops for teachers, soldiers and heads of community centres – those responsible for helping young people cope.

Rabbi Peled said he has also been asked to give the seminars here in Toronto. "The danger isn't only in Israel," he said.

While the recreational aspects of the camp are important, "it is a serious, intensive program," he said.

On arrival, participants are given a minute-by-minute introduction to what will happen during the four days.

Through group workshops and individual counselling, the teenagers learn how to cope with various situations that may arise, what decisions they may have to make and how to face the consequences of those decisions.

Even the recreation is part of the curriculum. Hiking in the forests, singing songs, telling stories and having adventures are all interspersed with advice and lessons from the counsellors.

At the end of the seminar, Rabbi Peled said, "kids have the tools to cope with the pressures of life, and the pressures of the intifadah. We will strengthen them so they won't fall by the wayside [and use drugs or engage in similar behaviour.]"

Rabbi Peled warned that if these teens are not properly cared for now, "there will be real trouble."

Yet, he said, Retorno does not receive government funding and relies on private donations, and even those private donations are slow to come, as many people believe there are more important causes to donate to.

Aging survivors often relive past trauma, says social worker

MONTREAL – Health care professionals should be aware that even routine medical procedures can trigger post-traumatic stress syndrome (PTSS) in elderly Holocaust survivors, and for many, especially those with cognitive impairment, it can be like reliving the horrors of the past, says social worker Myra Giberovitch, who co-ordinates services for survivors and their families at the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors.

Some survivors avoid medical treatment because they associate illness and hospitalization with death, Giberovitch said in a recent address at the CJCS.

A crisis forcing a survivor into a hospital, long-term care institution or social service agency can be traumatic, she said, because it arouses feelings of helplessness and persecution.

In fact, growing old itself brings on special problems for Holocaust survivors who coped relatively well when they were younger, said Giberovitch, who has worked extensively with survivors and their families.

"As survivors age, past vulnerabilities are emerging that require understanding and a compassionate community response."

Stressful events such as retirement, loss of loved ones, declining autonomy, moving to a new home or financial insecurity can be reminders of survivors' wartime experiences and the feelings of grief and powerlessness they felt at the time.

At this stage of their lives, survivors often exhibit symptoms of PTSS such as intrusive recollections, sleep disturbances and increased anxiety, Giberovitch said.

With retirement, children moving away and spouses dying, there are fewer distractions for survivors, she said, and they have more time to think about what they went through.

The daughter of survivors of the Lodz ghetto and Auschwitz, Giberovitch has worked with hundreds of survivors both in private practice and as a community professional.

Even a doctor's appointment or simple test can provoke anxiety and depression, she said.

"Medical personnel must be sensitive to a patient's history and understand his or her individual needs… It is important that physicians have an understanding of survivors, because they are often the contact point in the system for patients who have been admitted to the hospital involuntarily due to a medical emergency."

However, Giberovitch warns against pressing Holocaust survivors to talk about the past if they seem disinclined to do so.

Talk therapy is not an option for most survivors, Giberovitch said. Few turn to mental health care professionals to help deal with their trauma, because "speaking to people outside the family about one's problems is not part of their belief system."

But Giberovitch said that in her experience, trust can be established between a therapist and a survivor if the therapist is equipped with sufficient knowledge and psychological stamina to handle this type of case.

Mideast radicals in their own words

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Sept. 11 tragedy, perpetrated by Arab hijackers, 15 of whom were Saudi nationals, concentrated minds on the phenomenon of Islamic radicalism.

Yet long before the World Trade Center towers in Manhattan collapsed, the United States and its Middle East allies, most notably Israel, had been targeted by an unholy coalition of radical Arab states, Iran and and Islamic movements such as Hezbollah, the terrorist group whose political wing was recently banned in Canada.

What accounts for this visceral hatred? For an answer, read Anti-American Terrorism and the Middle East (Oxford University Press), edited by Barry Rubin and Judith Colp. It provides an understanding of the threat facing the West today.

The book, in the main, consists of important documents – speeches, political programs and newspaper articles, written by, among others: Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the first spiritual leader of revolutionary Iran; Sheikh Muhammad Sayyed Tantawi, an Egyptian cleric who justifies suicide bombings; Osama bin Laden, who calls for jihad; and Saddam Hussein, who disparages Israel as a "freak entity."

This chilling book also examines the roots of Muslim animus toward the United States and with the Islamist view of life.

In a brief introductory essay, an anonymous author says Arab states that engage in or sponsor terrorism, such as Syria, are motivated by a desire to address political problems they cannot resolve by direct military means.

Furthermore, militant Arab regimes regard the United States as an impediment to their regional ambitions, and Arab governments that have failed to give their citizens better lives, or real democracy, find it useful to blame homegrown problems on supposedly malevolent foreign powers.

Unresolved regional issues, from the Arab-Israeli dispute to United Nations sanctions against Iraq, have triggered anti-American animosity. But ultimately, Arab antagonism can be seen as a function of resistance to modernization, Westernization and globalization.

In a trenchant monograph, David Zeidan writes that modern Islamic fundamentalism – which arose in Egypt in the 1920s – is a reaction against political oppression and secularism. Its goal is to restore Islamic glory and purify society from un-Islamic influences.

Zeidan focuses much of his attention on the ideologue of the Muslim Brotherhood movement in Egypt, Sayyid Qutb (1906-1966), who defined the Christian West, Judaism, Zionism and Freemansonry as the enemies of Islam.

In his vitriolic and conspiratorial outpourings, Qutb stated that Jews were behind every misfortune that ever befell Muslims through the ages.

Qutb's zealous acolytes, Khomeini and bin Laden, perpetuated his legacy. Their writings are not only revealing but self-incriminating.

"Since its inception, Islam was afflicted with Jews who distorted the reputation of Islam by assaulting and slandering it, and this has continued to the present day," Khomeini observes in a typical passage.

In another rant, entitled Islam is Not a Religion of Pacifists, he states unequivocably: "Those who study jihad will understand why Islam wants to conquer the whole world."

Sheikh Tantawi, who heads Al-Azhar Islamic University in Cairo, a major centre of learning, weighs in on suicide bombers in no uncertain terms.

"Divine laws do not approve the killing of children, old people and peaceful citizens," he allows, "but those doing suicide operations are in a state of legitimate self-defence."

Hezbollah's official program, promulgated in 1985, is viciously anti-American and anti-Israel.

"We see in Israel the vanguard of the United States in our Islamic world. It is the hated enemy that must be fought until the hated ones get what they deserve."

And then the finale: "Our struggle will end only when this entity is obliterated. We recognize no treaty with it, no ceasefire and no peace agreements."

Hamas' charter is just as emphatic: "Israel, by virtue of its being Jewish and of having a Jewish population, defies Islam and Muslims."

Ahmad Abu Halabiya, a member of the Palestinian Authority, has this to say in a sermon: "Allah, deal with the Jews, your enemies and the enemies of Islam."

Bin Laden, in an interview, states clearly, "Our duty is to incite the jihad against America, Israel and their allies." He claims that Jews defame and burn the Koran.

In a broadcast that sounds like neo-Nazi propaganda, Saddam fantasizes that the American people have become "a toy in the hands of criminal world Zionism and its accursed, freak entity, which has usurped the land of Palestine and the land of the Arabs."

Anyone who reads Anti-American Terrorism in the Middle East cannot but conclude that Arab radicalism and Islamic fundamentalism are the twin terrors of our time.

Defensive specialist Halpern looks after his own end

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Jeff Halpern knows it's not his responsibility to concern himself with the Washington Capitals' offensive woes.

He'll leave that task to teammates Jaromir Jagr and Peter Bondra, players long known for their scoring prowess.

Halpern centres the Caps' checking line. Flanked by wingers Mike Grier and team captain Steve Konowalchuk, together they form one of the National Hockey League's best defensive units. It's their job to shut down the opposition's top snipers and take care of their own end of the rink.

'My plus-minus rating is a stat I take a lot of pride in'

The fact Washington was tied for 23rd in the league, averaging 2.4 goals through the club's first 22 games, did not bother Halpern as much as the defensive lapses that allowed Toronto to score key goals in a 5-4 Caps road loss earlier in the season.

"[My plus-minus rating] is a stat I take a lot of pride in, so obviously it's disturbing," the six-foot, 201-lb. centre said after a minus-2 night.

"If anything, [first-year coach Bruce Cassidy] has asked us to take more of a defensive role because if we don't stop pucks going in our net and giving up chances, then it's going to make for a long year. The other end will take care of itself."

A 26-year-old graduate of Princeton, Halpern became the first player born and raised in the Maryland area to reach the NHL after signing as an undrafted free agent on Mar. 30, 1999. He had been approached by other clubs after finishing his college career, but was only interested in playing for the Caps, the team he grew up idolizing.

The local hero was inducted into the Greater Washington Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in 2000 and has previously been given permission to skip practice in observance of Yom Kippur.

"It's something that means a lot to the people in the Washington community so I don't mind doing it," said Halpern, who along with Los Angeles Kings defenceman Mathieu Schneider are currently the league's only two Jewish players. "The organization's been good to me as far as that's concerned."

A former season-ticket holder, Halpern played for the Little Caps youth team growing up and team president Dick Patrick, a family friend, once coached him.

Over his first two full seasons in the NHL, Halpern had 39 goals and was a collective plus 34 as he developed into one of the game's top defensive forwards.

Halpern was coming off his first 20-goal season as training camp opened in September 2001, but he was engaged in tough contract negotiations that prevented him from attending camp.

The summer-long contract clash with management ended in a two-year deal with a club option for a third, but the difficult negotiations were only the beginning of a nightmarish season.

After only five games, Konowalchuk was forced to undergo major shoulder surgery and did not skate with Halpern again until opening night this season. The injury broke up what had been by far the team's top unit the previous two seasons.

"[Konowalchuk's] a great player and it's always a pleasure to play with him," said Halpern. "He seems to raise the [level] of our team, especially myself.

"It's fun playing with Kono, but I'd like to think I'd be able to play with other people as well. There are a lot of good players on this team."

In Konowalchuk's absence last year, Halpern struggled at both ends of the ice, scoring just five goals and adding 14 assists in 48 games, with a minus 9 rating. One of the few bright notes was that four of his tallies were game winners, second on the team in that department.

Before suffering a torn anterior cruciate ligament in his left knee in Montreal in mid-January, Halpern was fighting for ice time, having occasionally been demoted to the fourth-line, while being shifted from centre over to the wing.

When his game finally did start rounding into form, he suffered the season-ending injury when he slid feet first into the boards after a check by Habs defenceman Francis Bouillon.

He underwent surgery and was sidelined for the last 34 games of the year.

Halpern worked his way back into shape before the start of this season and was ready to go on opening night, despite injuring his groin during the exhibition schedule.

Feeling he was again 100 per cent healthy, Halpern appeared in all of Washington's first 39 games, scoring five goals and adding 11 assists. While his numbers, particularly his plus-minus rating, (+2) do not seem overly impressive, Halpern is for the most part satisfied with how his season has been going.

"I've been pretty pleased with the way I've played this year except for [three games]," he said, alluding to the one he had just completed in Toronto, as well as two others in which he was a combined minus 9.

"Take those three games away and I've had a pretty good year."

TU B'SHEVAT PERSIAN BARLEY

1 cup pearl barley
3 cups water
1/2 cup chopped pitted dates
1/2 cup chopped dried apricots
3 tblsp. orange marmalade
3/4 tps. ground cumin
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/2 cup slivered toasted almonds

In a medium saucepan bring the barley and the water to a boil. Reduce the heat to low and cook, covered for 45 minutes until barley is tender and liquid is absorbed.

Coat a large skillet with nonstick spray. Cook and stir dates, apricots and marmalade over medium heat for 3 minutes. Blend in cumin, salt and pepper and simmer for 2 minutes longer. Stir in cooked barley and almonds. Reduce heat to medium low and cook until warmed through. Serves 4.

DearKarilani

Dear Karilani,

I am a Grade 12 student, and in a few weeks, it will be time for me to start applying to university. The problem is that I am not sure I am ready to leave high school. I do not really know what schools I would like to attend, or which programs interest me. I am afraid I will make the wrong choice. What can I do?

Confused Student

About Teens

Dear Confused Student,

It is normal to be nervous about going to university. It is a huge step in your life and it comes with many changes.

The first thing you need to do is discuss your options with people who know you well. Talk to your parents, your friends and your teachers, and ask them where they think your strengths lie. For example, if they say you are good at giving advice, you may want to think about applying to a social work program. Remember, many schools allow you to switch majors, so you don't have to worry that you are making an irreversible decision.

Next, you need to become familiar with the different schools. Check your school guidance office for brochures from different universities and find out if a representative will be making a presentation. Before you apply to a school, make sure it can accommodate your needs. If you are choosing a school outside of the city you live in, you may want to research the residences there. As well, it is a good idea to find out about the different clubs the school has. You want a school that fulfils all your academic and non-academic needs.

Finally, see if you can visit the campus. The brochures can be very helpful, but it is sometimes difficult to get a clear picture of the school without actually being there. A tour guide will show you different buildings and will be able to answer your questions. This will help you decide whether or not to apply.

Remember too that you can apply to many different schools and later on choose which schools you would like to attend. You don't need to make up your mind now. Good luck!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL

The Best Medicine

YOUR HOSPITAL, YOUR NEWS

Brazilian CARNIVAL BALL

Samba, Sensation and Success

"Samba, Sensation and Success" emulate this year's Brazilian Carnival Ball. Mount Sinai Hospital is honoured to have been selected as the beneficiary of the 37th Brazilian Carnival Ball to be held on Saturday, April 26, 2003 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, South Building.

The Brazilian Ball is Canada's largest, most high profile and successful fundraising gala. It has raised millions of dollars for numerous causes over the years. This year's Ball will support an exciting new Centre for Excellence in Critical Care at Mount Sinai Hospital under the directorship of Dr. Tom Stewart.

The Centre will bring together critical care professionals from around the world who will share and enhance their expertise via international forums that will focus on leadership development. This is another example of Mount Sinai Hospital taking a leadership role in ensuring we have highly trained specialists to meet the growing international demand for Critical Care experts.

Co-Chairs Renée Wolfe, Liora Yakubowicz, and Sharon Zuckerman, along with their dedicated committee members, are working alongside Brazilian Carnival Ball Founder, Anna Maria de Souza to ensure that this year will be a Samba, a Sensation and a Success!

By supporting the Brazilian Carnival Ball 2003, you are helping Mount Sinai in our pursuit of excellence and in the fight to save lives locally, nationally and internationally.

A special thankyou to Eli Lilly, who have come forward as our Presenting Sponsor, and to Scotiabank, our Premier Sponsor. Other sponsors such as Ford Motor Company of Canada have donated prizes such as a Lincoln Aviator and a $10,000 shopping spree at Holt Renfrew Stores.

To purchase your table or to receive more information please contact Cindy Berk, Director of the Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary at 416-586-4681 or by email; brazilianball@mtsinai.on.ca or online; www.brazilianball.com

President's New Year message

Our Mount Sinai Hospital family has a strong belief in the future, and the belief in discovering and delivering The Best Medicine. As we enter a New Year, Mount Sinai continues to move forward with enthusiasm. Our accomplishments are many. We have committed ourselves to tackling challenges and turning them into success. How do we do this? By delivering a compelling case for increased government funding, finding innovative ways to recruit highly qualified employees, training staff to see the world through patients' eyes and establishing new centres that will enhance the care we provide.

These successes would not be possible without the incredible dedication and support from our staff, volunteers and the community. We are especially grateful for the ongoing generosity of our donors who have helped us revitalize our patient care areas, invest in state-of-the-art equipment and support our research endeavours.

I take this opportunity, on behalf of everyone at Mount Sinai to thank you for your generosity and to wish you a happy, healthy and prosperous New Year.

North Korea is not just Asia's crisis

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

The nuclear crisis in North Korea, exacerbated by the country's recent withdrawal from the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty (NPT), concerns not only the Korean peninsula, Japan and southeast Asia. If the crisis is not resolved, it could have considerable impact on the Middle East.

It would be a mistake to regard the North Korean crisis as an Asia-only problem. North Korea has distributed missile technology to countries such as Iraq and could also sell nuclear know-how to various states in the Mideast.

North Korea has also helped set up ground-to-ground missile production lines in radical states such as Iran and is responsible for enlarging the ranges of those missiles and improving their accuracy. These missiles can be fitted with chemical and biological warheads and, in the future, with nuclear warheads. Dozens of North Korean experts also work in Syria's Military Research Institute and are active in Libya and Iran.

North Korea is the first state to withdraw from the NPT. First it unilaterally cancelled its participation in the supervision agreement when it threw out observers of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and removed its monitoring cameras.

Tu b'Shvat has arrived

Schoolchildren plant a sapling in the area earmarked for Ya'ar Hatanach – the Bible Forest – the centrepiece of this year's Jewish National Fund festivities in Israel for Tu b'Shvat, which falls this year on Jan. 18. Unlike the usual evergreens in most JNF forests, the Bible Forest, located southwest of Jerusalem, will be planted with the trees and vegetation of ancient Israel, from cypress, date and myrtle trees to olive trees and grapevines. Sections will be developed based on themes of the Bible – such as the prophets, Psalms, and Song of Songs – and planted appropriately. [Photo courtesy of JNF]

Col. Ilan Ramon

By YITZHAK BEN-HORIN
Special to The CJN

HOUSTON — Ilan Ramon walks the pathways of the Johnson Space Center in Houston, slowed by the weight of the thick book under his arm. It's the bible of the "magnificent seven" – the group that boards the space shuttle Columbia for blast off scheduled for Jan. 16. Among these elite seven, for the first time, is an Israeli.

Ramon, 48, a colonel in the Israeli Air Force, counts among his experience over 4,000 hours in fighter jets. Following a decision by former U.S. president Bill Clinton in 1995, the United States and Israel signed an agreement stipulating that an Israeli astronaut would fly on an American space shuttle as a payload specialist, supervising an Israeli scientific experiment.

In 1997, Ramon, who graduated from Tel Aviv University with a degree in electronics and computer engineering, was selected. In July 1998, he reported for training at the Johnson Space Center where he began to

The News in Brief

CANADA

Group's Ban Sought

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has called on Ottawa to add the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade to its list of banned terrorist groups. B'nai Brith made the call after the militia of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction claimed responsibility for recent terror bombings in Tel Aviv. Canada recently added all of Hezbollah's operations to the list, which was created under legislation passed after 9/11 and now includes 16 groups. Banned organizations can have their assets in Canada seized, and anyone belonging to or helping them faces a possible 10-year prison sentence.

TV Series Monitored

OTTAWA — In a written response to a letter from Canadian Jewish Congress President Keith Landy, Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham said he is "gravely concerned" about reports the 41-part Horseman Without a Horse series now airing on Egyptian TV "contains strong anti-Semitic undertones" that are "unacceptable and create an atmosphere detrimental to peace and reconciliation." Graham said embassy staff in Egypt are monitoring the series and Canada's ambassador has already expressed Canada's concerns to Egyptian authorities. He said Canada has also requested an advance viewing of the series, reportedly based on the Czarist anti-Semitic tract The Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

ISRAEL

New Russian Envoy

JERUSALEM — A man who immigrated to Israel from the former Soviet Union has been named Israel's ambassador to Russia. On Jan. 1, Arkady Melman, 45, who immigrated to Israel 15 years ago, was appointed the Jewish state's envoy to Moscow. He is the first Russian immigrant to be named a major Israeli ambassador, Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said.

Nuptials Unrecognized

JERUSALEM — French consulates in Jerusalem and Haifa are refusing to recognize Israeli weddings if the marriage certificate is issued by the Chief Rabbinate's branches in the West Bank or Gaza. A spokesperson said the policy isn't new, the Jerusalem Post reported. France doesn't recognize the documents "because it is the location of the rabbinate issuing the certificate that matters," she said.

Death Toll

JERUSALEM — The Israeli-Palestinian conflict claimed the lives of 447 Israelis in 2002. Some 2,344 Israelis were also injured in the conflict, according to the Israel Defence Forces. Of those killed, 292 were civilians and 155 were security personnel. Of the dead, 299 were male and 148 female; 57 were children.

Election Ad Banned

JERUSALEM — The right-wing Herut Party is appealing a decision by Israel's Central Election Committee to ban its controversial TV campaign ad. The party's spot features an Arabic-language parody of Hatikvah, the Israeli national anthem, and shows an Israeli flag morphing into a Palestinian flag. The song's lyrics reportedly were assembled from snippets of chants heard in Palestinian areas, including "Let's expel the Jews" and others calling for Palestinians to conquer all of Israel.

WORLD

Rabbi Attacked

PARIS — The car of French Rabbi Gabriel Farhi, who was stabbed Jan. 3, was set on fire last week outside his Paris apartment. Just hours before his stabbing, the synagogue received an anonymous letter threatening both him and the shul as revenge for the killing of Palestinians. Rabbi Farhi, who runs a group that promotes peace with the Palestinians, suffered minor wounds in the stabbing. Both incidents remain unsolved. The stabbing was the first anti-Semitic attack in France in months.

Banker Backs Wife

AMSTERDAM — The head of the European Central Bank has come out in support of his wife's pro-Palestinian stance. In a statement last week, Wim Duisenberg said he supports his wife Gretta "100 per cent." During a visit to the Mideast earlier last week, Gretta Duisenberg said Israel is committing terrorism against the Palestinians. Last April, she caused an uproar in Holland when she draped a Palestinian flag from her balcony in Amsterdam.

Arab Youths Sentenced in Woman's Killing

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem District Court last week sentenced seven Israeli Arabs, six of them minors, to between three and 25 years imprisonment for the killing of Moran Amit on Jerusalem's Armon Hanatsiv Promenade about one year ago, Army Radio reported.

Amit and her boyfriend were walking on the promenade when they were accosted by a group of masked youths from the nearby neighbourhood of Abu Tor. The boyfriend ran for help. Amit, a Haifa University law student, tried to flee, but was pursued into a nearby forest and stabbed to death.

A few months earlier, the same gang stabbed and seriously wounded another man on the promenade. The seven had also tried to carry out attacks in the capital and threw firebombs at residential buildings.

The judges ruled there was no need to take the age of the defendants into consideration.

"Maybe a harsh punishment will cause the parents to prevent their children from being involved in criminal acts," the sentence said.

Jewish and Aboriginal leaders meet

CJC, BBC take part in dialogue

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Jewish and Aboriginal leaders met here last week to try and mend relationships in the wake of anti-Semitic remarks made recently by Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew.

Representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada met in separate meetings with Matthew Coon Come, chief of the Assembly of First Nations (AFN), and Perry Bellegarde, chief of the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations and AFN vice-chief.

As a result of the meetings, Coon Come and Bellegarde accepted invitations from both groups to accompany them on trips to Israel – possibly this summer – and extended invitations to Jewish leaders to visit the nations.

CJC president Keith Landy described their meeting as warm and engaging and said CJC is grateful to Chief Coon Come for the leadership he has shown in dealing quickly with a painful and hateful episode.

Afterward, Landy told reporters that leaders of both groups talked about reaffirming their bonds, and looked at ways to learn about each other's culture.

He said he welcomed Coon Come and Bellegarde with a Hebrew blessing and invited them to Israel to see how the Jewish people built a home there over 4,000 years ago.

Rochelle Wilner, B'nai Brith's president, said they discussed how the two communities could work together, "community with community, friend with friends, and [respect each other's] shared goals and dreams.

More election turbulence

What a difference a week can make in the stumpings and hustings of an election campaign. It is true of any election. It is especially true of an election in Israel.

Last week in this space, I wrote that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has not been implicated in the Likud party Knesset list scandal swirling around his party.

That statement remains true. But in the course of the week, a different cloud of scandal started to swirl around the prime minister. It relates to the lending and repayment of a $1.5 million (US) loan from a South African businessman to the prime minister's sons. No wrongdoing has yet been proved, but an odour hovers over the transaction and the Israeli media are buzzing around it.

Sharon went on national television last week to explain away the allegations, but the telecast of his press conference was stopped in mid-sentence by the chair of the Central Elections Committee (CEC), Judge Mishael Chesin.

Chesin ordered the networks to stop the telecast because, in his view, Sharon had departed from making an apolitical statement – namely, merely offering his version of the loan-related events – and instead, had begun to hurl political accusations at the other parties, which Chesin characterized as electioneering, and which, under Israeli law, is not allowed at this stage of an election campaign.

Thus, with these new questions surrounding the prime minister, even though a majority of Israelis seem to prefer his policies on security matters, a portion of that majority may be so repulsed by the apparent web of lapsed ethics ensnaring the Likud party and, now, possibly its leader, too, that there is no way of knowing how they will vote.

The Israeli voters will face some 27 party lists of candidates from among which to choose the members of the next Knesset. It is a daunting prospect in a daunting, perplexing system.

As of this writing, little more than two weeks remain before the election. Undoubtedly, more developments will intervene yet to push and pull the voters' inclinations.

Yet another such development took place last week.

A panel of 11 Supreme Court justices overturned the CEC's decision the preceding week to disqualify Arab MKs Ahmed Tibi and Azmi Bishara and Bishara's Balad party from eligibility in the elections. The CEC had implemented the ban because the MKs had supported terrorism against Israel.

At the same time, the court upheld the decision to allow former Kach party member Baruch Marzel, who recanted his affiliation to the party, to run in the election. It also upheld the decision to disqualify Likud candidates Shaul Mofaz and Moshe Feiglin on purely technical grounds.

The initial decisions by the CEC concerning Tibi and Bishara evoked strong reaction throughout the country. Many people charged that the right-wing dominated committee had compromised fundamental democratic rights. The Arab community in Israel was especially perturbed.

Not surprisingly, the Supreme Court's decisions have evoked an equally strong reaction throughout the country. Many applauded the justices; many others condemned them. National Religious Party legislator Shaul Yahalom said the court was out of touch with "the values of the Israeli people." He said that permitting Bishara to run was tantamount to a "slap in the face" to Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein, who had recommended Bishara's disqualification, as well as to the Shin Bet, the domestic security service, which had made a similar recommendation.

The court's reasons for judgment have not yet been issued. Nevertheless, Ze'ev Segal, a political analyst with Ha'aretz, wrote that the court's verdicts "remove all content from Clause 7a of The Basic Law: the Knesset, which states that parties or candidates whose goals or deeds negate the existence of the State of Israel as a Jewish, democratic country, who incite to racism, who are engaged in an armed struggle against the state or who support an enemy or a terror group will be barred from seeking election."

In an exchange of correspondence with his colleagues, Prof. Gerald Steinberg of Bar Ilan University and a CJN columnist, provided a wider context for justifying Tibi's and Bishara's disqualification:

"Perhaps unsurprisingly, most of the discussion on the 'Jewish and democratic' mix ignores the situation of the Jewish people in the real world. Israel now has almost half of the surviving population of Jews in the world, and given the organization of the world into nation states with dominant cultures... without a Jewish state, we would not survive, either physically and culturally... Jews in Israel are morally entitled to affirmative action in many areas, including land ownership.

"The Arabs, including Palestinians, are the dominant group in the region... while Jews are the aboriginal people in this land, entitled and in need of protection. Israel's minority Palestinian Arab population are entitled to full rights as individuals within these parameters, but as a group, their rights must be consistent with the requirements of Jewish survival."

Many, if not most, people in Israel will agree that Jews are "the aboriginal people in [that] land, entitled and in need of protection," but they will probably differ on the legal implications that arise from that statement.

With its decision last week, the Supreme Court has defined one set of those implications.

Health group pulls anti-Semitic books – again

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

An alternative health group has removed several anti-Semitic books from its Web site after a complaint from Canadian Jewish Congress.

The Consumer Health Organization of Canada (CHOC) pulled books by Eustace Mullins, David Icke and William Cooper from the list of materials available for sale on its Web site after Congress went public with its concerns. One of the books, Behold A Pale Horse, by Williams contains a modified version of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, said Len Rudner, director of community relations for Congress's Ontario wing.

Rudner said the return of the books to the site violated "an understanding we had with them after the first blow up regarding Mullins in [February] 2001."

At the time the CHOC dropped Mullins as a speaker at its Total Health Conference under pressure from Congress and after sponsors threatened to pull their support. His books were also removed from the group's Web site.

"It is unconscionable that CHOC would think that people have short memories as to forget about the nature of Mullins' and Icke's writings," said Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

Mullins' published work includes rehashes of medieval blood libels that charge Jews with killing Christian children for ritual purposes. In his New History of the Jews, Mullins claims Jews are "carriers" of communism and "furry scavengers who have found their way through the sewers into every civilized place."

In the Secret Holocaust, he describes in gruesome detail a medieval blood libel in which "Jews, their eyes filled with blood lust and hatred of the gentiles, gather around the [Christian] child and pierce its flesh and drink its blood and call down curses upon the name of Jesus Christ."

Icke, a former spokesperson for Britain's Green Party and a self-proclaimed "son of God," was banned by the party from addressing its 1994 convention because of the anti-Semitic views contained in his book The Robots Rebellion.

CHOC president Libby Gardon last week told the National Post she has known Mullins for 15 years and called him "a very fine person and a very gentle soul."

She also said his books were returned to the Web site at the behest of a prominent member of the health group, whom she declined to identify.

Two years ago, Gardon agreed to remove his books after being informed about their contents by Congress.

"We now know more about his early works and cannot endorse his participation," she said at the time.

Gardon declined to be interviewed for this story.

Jewish, Aboriginal leaders meet

"A trip to Israel would be a good opportunity for the Aboriginal leaders to study the Holocaust in the context of anti-racism in Canada," Wilner added.

Coon Come later told each press conference it was imperative to "sit down and assess where we go from here.

"Any form of racism is unacceptable. It pollutes human relations and poisons the mind of people. We kindly accept invitations to Israel, and we extend invitations to you to visit our community, and look at where we live and at the plight of our people."

He apologized again for Ahenakew's remarks, and said native leaders need to move forward and educate their people.

"We want to put this behind us, and go down the path of reconciliation and better understanding."

Ahenakew, who was the AFN chief in the 1980s, has been removed from its senate, and from all boards and commissions on which he had served. As stated in earlier reports, CJC has requested that he also be stripped of his Order of Canada.

Bellegarde said they reached out to the Jewish people "because we know the pain and sorrow of racism. A [racist] statement from one of our own cannot be tolerated or accepted.

"Education and awareness is the first step to understanding. We need to educate our children and our grandchildren so people can believe in their hearts that we can co-exist."

But education must be reciprocated, he said. "Understanding leads to action. Things do not move until there is a catalyst; this is the catalyst. We will make good come out of the [racist] statement."

The Jewish community has extended its hand and "we accept it with good hearts," he said.

"Both our people share, at the core of our moral and ethical systems, a fundamental respect for all peoples. We want to explore the many ways we can work together and explore each other."

Asked if he thought Ahenakew should be prosecuted, Landy said that native sentencing, which consists of a sentencing circle, and a healing circle in which the offender speaks directly with victims, is an area that might be explored.

"I melted off 45 pounds easily!"

Hello, I'm Wendy Rayner from Newmarket. I lost 45 pounds of fat in six short months! I dropped from an uncomfortable size 16 to a petite size 4! I'm sharing my amazing true story with you in hopes that you too will be inspired to have the healthy life you deserve.

Wendy Rayner
BEFORE
Hypnosis

For as long as I can remember, dieting was a significant part of my life. I was always embarrassed about my size. If we went to a pool party, I would hide in shorts and oversized T-shirts. People would say to me, "Aren't you hot?"

"Not at all," I'd lie. "I'm cool as a cucumber." I wasn't fooling anybody. They knew I was suffering to avoid showing my body.

For 30 years I was on and off Weight Watchers. I tried all sorts of diets and gimmicks in between. I was depressed and desperate to find a better way. I saw an ad in the paper for Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres and said, "I'm there!" I called that very day for my free weight loss consultation.

Positive Changes Delivered!

I simply can't express how satisfied I am. With Positive Changes, I melted off 45 lbs. easily! And keeping my weight off is a snap. My hypnosis program totally blew away everything else I'd tried. I have no cravings. I don't feel deprived. I never have those dieter's hunger pangs. The only time I'm hungry is when it's the right time to eat.

Is that really ME in leather pants?

I have had so much fun shopping for clothes now that I am slim. At my first session, my hypnotist asked me what I would be wearing when I lost my 45 pounds. I said, "I will be wearing a pair of black leather pants." As you can see in my "AFTER" pictures, I have my leather pants, in a sleek size 4! Now that I have lost my weight with Positive Changes, I know I will never gain it back.

What's New columnist retires after 31 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Whenever people have asked Miriam Herman what's new, she has always known.

Herman, 81, who recently retired from The Canadian Jewish News after working here for more than 31 years, has compiled the newspaper's What's New column since its inception.

> 'Leaving the paper like leaving my second family'

Her decision to retire has been bittersweet. "I felt it was time, but leaving the paper is like leaving my second family. It's not easy."

This was her first job, she says, other than a brief stint as a nurse after training during the war years at a hospital in Patterson, N.J.

"[At the time when] I raised my two daughters, Meta and Thea, mothers did not go to work. I was involved in my children's school and I was active in the Holy Blossom Temple sisterhood, but I never did paid work."

But she was widowed at an early age – her husband, lawyer Lou Herman, died before he was 50 – and after serving two years as president of the sisterhood, she says she needed something to fill up her life.

"My husband had known Sol Littman, the first editor of the CJN, and when he told me about the What's New column, I thought it would be perfect. I had always wanted to write, and although this wasn't really a writing job, I would be working for a newspaper.

"If someone had told me I would be there 31 years later, though, I would have laughed at them."

Leaving her readers, she says, is also difficult. "When I first started the column, we had no fax or e-mail, so everyone called in with their submissions.

"I spoke to some people every week, and although I never met them in person, we became friends. I would worry if someone hadn't called in a few weeks."

One family even invited her to their grandson's bar mitzvah, she said. "Technology changed things a lot."

It also sped things up a great deal. She recalls typing the column on a manual typewriter, surrounded by reams and reams of paper.

"In the first while that we started on computer, one of my columns was lost and I had to redo it on the typewriter. I thought of that almost every time I closed a column."

She never became an expert on the computer, she says. "One of the things I did best was step away from my desk and holler, 'Help.'"

Miriam Herman

Of all the aspects of her work, she says, she admired the volunteer workers who sent her submissions, she said.

"Most of them are working hard for an organization that has a small budget. This column is one of the only ways they can get their word out.

"I tried especially hard for the seniors who usually had only a small nucleus of volunteers.

"I admired people who would call even if they weren't feeling well, or if they were just running out their door. They always wanted to get the word out for their organization. On the most part, they are very appreciative of the free service."

She loved having a pulse on the community.

"If I was in my car, and I would see a sign for a synagogue or organization that I had written about, I would be pleased to see that it was actually out there. It made my job all the more real.

"It's an important column. I'm still amazed at how many people read it. It's often the first column they turn to when they open the paper.

"A lot of people want to get involved in community events, and this is an excellent resource for getting information."

Herman is looking forward to spending more leisure time with her husband, Dr. Cyril Rotenberg, "but I'm going to miss the office. The staff is as warm and friendly as it was when we were a tiny group of people working on top of a bank on Bathurst Street.

"Most of the people changed, and the technology changed, but the warmth and character is still there. That's what I'll miss most of all."

Diplomatic buffoonery

We ought not to be surprised when diplomats utter undiplomatic statements. But it is still shocking when diplomats, accredited to Canada and therefore presumably familiar with the fabric of the cherished democratic cloak in which Canadians culturally, historically and legally wrap ourselves, expose their brazen, naked ignorance of Canadian normative values for all to see and hear. Such was the case last week.

Raymond Baaklini, Lebanon's ambassador to Canada was called to account for the opinions he recently expressed in Sada al Machric, an Arabic-language newspaper. Baaklini explained that the Canadian government decided last month to list Hezbollah as a terrorist organization because "90 per cent of the mass media in Canada is controlled by Jews or Zionists."

The statement, of course, is as ignorant of Canada as it is absurd on its merits. It is nothing more than a bilious, base regurgitation onto Canadian soil of the venom of anti-Semitism that seems, alas, to have infected a great deal of the Muslim world.

But the implacable ambassador said more in his interview. He also issued an unveiled warning to Canadians travelling in the Middle East. "I am afraid the Canadian would have the urgency to wear a non-Canadian T-shirt in Lebanon and the Arabic world."

Such a buffoonish pronouncement by the representative of another government borders dangerously close to incitement against Canadians. It is wholly despicable, not only because of the grotesque ignorance underlying it, but far more because of its potential of placing Canadian lives in danger.

When questioned by a reporter about the comments attributed to him, Baaklini, did not deny them. Rather, in a further revealing statement, he said, as reported in the National Post: "The remarks were meant for an Arabic audience and he might have expressed them differently if he were addressing English readers." In other words, he believed them; he just would have hidden his belief from non-Arabic speaking Canadians.

In a revealing re-echoing of Baaklini's conspiracy comments, Mazen Chouaib, the executive director of the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations said the ambassador's remarks had been intentionally manipulated by the National Post, and that "Mr. Asper, [publisher of the National Post] should not be dictating Canadian policy."

To his credit, Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham called in the ambassador and admonished him for his views. In doing so, the minister affirmed our basic Canadian values. "We are a country that is based on openness, tolerance, respect for one another… and we certainly will not tolerate anti-Semitism in this country," Graham told the National Post. But, it is clear, by his beliefs and by his behaviour, that Ambassador Baaklini does not understand the fundamental truth about Canada. Minister Graham should also affirm another basic Canadian value. Ambassadors who spread anti-Semitism are not welcome here.

Fiddling while survivors die

It's a daunting task to react to an article that is entwined with riddles. I thought the oracular tradition had gone out of fashion with the ancient Greeks, only to be proven wrong by Roman Kent's article ("Criticism of the Claims Conference Undeserved," CJN, Nov. 28). Apart from spirited apologies for the Claims Conference, Kent spins a series of riddles befogging – I hope unwillingly – the issues at hand. Here are some prime examples:

Summarizing the philosophy of the founder of the American Federation of Labor, Kent calls for "more justice, less revenge" as the guiding principles for survivors. Indeed, a noble evocation. But who has ever advocated revenge and against whom? Certainly, not revenge against the Claims Conference that has done much good for survivors, according to Kent.

Perhaps against the German government? But why would the survivors want revenge against the German government when it intended the restitution monies to be "a 'hardship fund' to be used solely for the relief and rehabilitation of victims of Nazism in the narrowest sense, not for the repayment of any Jewish organization of funds expended on these items in the past"?

This is precisely what the victims who lived under the Nazi occupation are demanding. The above quote is taken from Ronald Zweig's book German Reparations and the Jewish World that was financed by the Claims Conference. While the conference meant the book to absolve the institution of wrongdoing, Zweig followed the facts. What ensued is the biblical Bilam story in reverse: Zweig came to praise and ended up exposing the conference's malfeasance.

Kent's passionate call to the survivors to unite is likewise suffused in darkness. What kind of survivors is he addressing? In a resurrective spirit, Jewish Agency CEO and Claims Conference vice-president Sallai Meridor claims that 400,000 survivors currently live in Israel, double the figure registered by UNRWA (United Nations Relief and Works Agency) in 1945. According to Claims Conference president Israel Singer, all klal Israel are survivors: Ich bin ein Uberelebidenger. The allocations of the restitution monies reflect his inclusive view. Would Kent enlighten us as to what school of thought he is embracing? Would it be presumptuous to assume that his call is addressed to the victims who lived under the Nazi occupation?

While Kent and his colleagues on the executive are fiddling riddles, the survivors are dying in droves, and the needy ones are languishing in destitution.

Safe to volunteer in Israel

My husband and I have just returned from a two-and-a-half-week stint as Sar-El volunteers, an experience that was more satisfying and productive than all the pro-Israeli rallies we've participated in and petitions we've signed. We were doing something concrete and useful: packing medical supplies.

But it was disappointing to see the small number of Jewish North American volunteers and the almost negligible presence – in some cases, total absence of North American Jews – in hotels and cities.

Our group consisted of 40 volunteers, half of whom were North American Jews, while 25 per cent were Christians from the United States, various countries of Europe, South Africa and New Zealand. During one weekend, our hotel in Tel Aviv hosted 220 Christian Nigerians, a handful of Europeans and a couple of Chinese people, but no North Americans apart from another volunteer and ourselves. At a time when Israel is endangered and suffers from a more than 10 per cent unemployment rate, it is heartening to see Christian support, but where are the North American Jews, the largest group of Jews in the Diaspora?

We would like to assure those who hesitate to go to Israel that as volunteers on a military base, we could not have been safer. We felt equally secure on the various tours organized for us and conducted by chartered bus. Not to deny nor to minimize the danger. I confess that when we were on our own on weekends, the sherut (communal taxi) was our preferred mode of travel.

But the fears we had in the Diaspora seemed to recede, perhaps by seeing the example of the Israelis who have replaced tourists in hotels, especially on weekends, and who continue to live as normally as possible. The main street of Rishon le Zion was packed with shoppers and diners on the evening we toured the city. On the last evening of Chanukah, Jerusalem displayed all the signs of a city on holiday: music blaring from loudspeakers, people munching doughnuts and children and parents watched as three Chabadniks, hoisted by a crane, lit a huge chanukiah in a little square on King George Street.

On the last Shabbat of our stay, as we walked all the way to Jaffa from the Tel Aviv beach, the boardwalk was full of sunbathers, ballplayers, sailors, fishermen, joggers, strollers and sidewalk vendors.

The Jewish North American presence, whether as volunteers or tourists, helps the economy and indicates moral support for, and solidarity with, Israel. On the other hand, its absence seems like abandonment.

Stop excusing the Liberals

The analysis of the performances of Jewish parliamentarians by Shimon Fogel is extremely misleading ("What's the score? Assessing the efficacy of Jewish parliamentarians and other friends of Israel," CJN, Dec. 19).

In politics, it is irresponsible to judge performance based on intention. Actions and results are what count in Ottawa, and in this respect, Canada's Liberal parliamentarians, especially the Jewish MPs, have failed miserably.

Canada's consistent censure of Israel at the UN General Assembly and its reluctance to support the U.S. war on terror are disgraceful. In addition, the Liberal ban of Hezbollah, which was put in place only after the threat of a lawsuit, can only be characterized as "too little, too late." In this atmosphere, it is irrelevant to talk about what individual MPs may or may not be doing behind the scenes.

Throughout it all, only one party has consistently and effectively championed Israel's cause on Parliament Hill. The Canadian Alliance has been a vocal supporter of Israel both inside and outside the House of Commons – not because the party is chasing votes, but because its members truly believe in the values on which Israel is founded: democracy and freedom.

We invite readers to examine the online Hansard records and see for themselves who Israel's friends are. Stop making excuses for Liberal failures.

Edging toward irrelevancy: Canada's vote at the 57th UN General Assembly

By DAVID GOLDBERG

Despite an agenda filled with international humanitarian crises and immediate threats to global security, the 57th session of the United Nations General Assembly that concluded in late December found time to adopt 20 resolutions on Israel, many of them blatantly biased against the Jewish state.

With one noteworthy exception, the resolutions were nothing new, had no binding authority in international law and will have no impact on Israel. But to the extent that Canada has anchored its foreign policy on the principles of internationalism and multilateral diplomacy, its voting record on the 20 Israel-related resolutions – support for 15 and abstentions on the remaining five – should be of deep concern to all Canadians. (For a complete listing of relevant resolutions and Canada's votes, visit the Canada-Israel Committee Web site at www.cicweb.ca.)

In a word, Canada's chronic failure to take a principled stand against the continued hijacking and perverting of the UN and other international institutions by Israel's enemies and its enemies' supporters (including 22 Arab states, 57 Muslim countries, and some 160 members of the Non-Aligned Movement) compromises the integrity of Canada's efforts to project internationally the core values that Canadians cherish.

The Israel-related resolutions were organized into a series of thematic clusters. The first cluster of six resolutions dealt with the work of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA). Canada's support for some of these resolutions might seem perfunctory – after all, who could oppose the continued provision of humanitarian assistance to Palestinian civilians given their impoverished circumstances, or scholarships for Palestinian students? By the same token, it could be argued that by endorsing the continued operation of UNRWA, Canada was perpetuating Palestinian suffering rather than ameliorating it.

UNRWA was originally set up to provide humanitarian relief to Palestinian refugees only until peace agreements were concluded between Israel and its Arab neighbours. Fifty-four years later, however, two of those neighbours, Syria and Lebanon, continue to reject Israeli peace initiatives and oppose the closing of UNRWA-administered refugee camps, preferring instead to use them to discredit Israel. UNRWA continues to operate in Palestinian refugee camps in the West Bank and Gaza, perpetuating the dependency of the refugees on international assistance and retarding their progress toward independence. Worse still, there is evidence of complicity by some UNRWA officials in permitting refugee camps to be transformed into armed terrorist bases, and UNRWA vehicles have been used to smuggle weapons and terrorists.

Canada could have made an important contribution toward restabilizing the situation by expressing its firm opposition to such dangerous abuses of UNRWA's mandate or by calling for the winding-down of the agency's operation. Instead, by endorsing additional funding for UNRWA, Canada was ensuring the continuation of the untenable status quo affecting Palestinian refugees.

An additional five resolutions were adopted on the work of "the Special Committee to Investigate Israeli Practices Affecting the Human Rights of the Palestinian People and Other Arabs of the Occupied Territories." Canada voted for four of these resolutions and abstained on the fifth.

Canada's support for resolutions in this cluster was based on an overly rigid and fundamentally flawed interpretation by Canada both of international law (including the Fourth Geneva Convention) and current Middle Eastern realities. For instance, one resolution condemned Israel's alleged mistreatment of Palestinians while completely ignoring the Palestinian Authority's systematic abuse of the rights of its own people. This resolution also ignored the fact that Israel's recent "re-occupation" of PA-controlled areas, and the attendant allegations of human rights abuses, were the direct consequence of PA President Yasser Arafat's rejection of former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's offer of independent statehood and the PA's resumed use of terrorism as a tool of diplomacy. Similarly, a resolution criticizing Israel's alleged abuse of the rights of Arab residents of "the Occupied Syrian Golan" ignores the general offers by successive Israeli prime ministers since the late Yitzhak Rabin to change the status quo of the Golan in return for peace, offers that were categorically rebuffed by Syria.

Canada's Foreign Minister Bill Graham

On the one resolution in this grouping that Canada did not support, a cursory reading of its Explanation of Vote, emphasizing that "inflammatory references to acts by only one side are not conducive to restoring dialogue," might lead one to conclude that Canada had cast a dissenting vote. Instead, Canada abstained, which, in the UN's politicized atmosphere, is tantamount to endorsing the hateful agendas of Israel's enemies.

A third cluster of four resolutions was adopted under the rubric "The Question of Palestine." Canada supported two of these resolutions and abstained on the other two. The most controversial of these dealt with the "Peaceful Settlement of the Question of Palestine." Among other things, it expressed "grave concern over the tragic events in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including East Jerusalem, since Sept. 28, 2000, and the continued deterioration of the situation, including the rising number of deaths and injuries, mostly among Palestinian civilians, the deepening humanitarian crisis facing the Palestinian people and the widespread destruction of Palestinian property and infrastructure, both private and public, including many institutions of the Palestinian Authority."

Canada abstained on last year's version of this resolution, expressing unhappiness with its unbalanced and unconstructive language. But this year, it supported it, citing the inclusion of a new clause condemning "all acts of violence and terror against civilians on both sides," presumably including attacks against Israelis. Indeed, in its Explanation Of Vote, Canada explicitly condemned "suicide attacks that target Israeli civilians, which are an affront to us all," and emphasized Canada's support for "Israel's legitimate right to defend itself and protect its citizens." However, in the very next breath, the statement set limits to this support, asserting that the exercise of Israel's right to self-defence "must always be undertaken in accordance with international law, particularly as it relates to the responsibilities of an occupying power and the protection of civilians in armed conflict."

This explanation is troubling for two reasons. First, Canada cannot have it both ways: it cannot express support for Israel's right to self-defence and then, after the fact, impose qualifications on that support. Second, in calling on Israel to abide by international law while protecting itself, Canada ignores the serious difficulties inherent in Israel's fighting a counter-terrorism war against a Palestinian adversary that seemingly has no inhibitions against placing its civilian population, especially its children, in harm's way. The absence of clauses explicitly encouraging the Palestinians to also comply with international conventions on the status of civilians in armed conflicts should have caused Canada to at least maintain its abstention on this resolution. As it is, by supporting a statement that unfairly places the onus of responsibility on Israel, Canada was signalling to the PA that they can continue to terrorize Israelis and endanger the lives of Palestinian civilians with impunity.

On two resolutions adopted under the "Situation in the Middle East," Canada split its vote. It supported a resolution condemning Israel's jurisdiction over Jerusalem, reflecting a skewed interpretation of international law and misreading of religious and historical claims over Jerusalem. Its criticism, through this resolution, of Israel's position on Jerusalem also completely ignored the fact that it was Arafat who rejected Barak's unprecedented concessions regarding the Temple Mount. By contrast, its abstention on a resolution criticizing Israeli control of "the Syrian Golan" reflected what seemed to be a heightened sensitivity to current realities, specifically Syria's refusal to compromise on the strategic plateau.

Chronic deficiencies in Canada's voting behaviour in international institutions were reflected in its abstention on a new General Assembly resolution expressing "deep concern about the consequences, including psychological consequences, of Israeli military actions on the present and future well-being of Palestinian children."

The so-called "Palestinian Children" resolution was overtly biased against Israel, completely ignoring the fate of scores of Israeli children wounded or killed by Palestinian terrorists in the "al-Aqsa intifada." It also ignored the PA's use of Palestinian children as cannon-fodder in armed confrontations with Israeli soldiers, as well as anti-Israel messages in the media and in school curricula designed to encourage Palestinian children to become suicide bombers.

While expressing deep concern about the welfare of Palestinian children and urging Israel to do all that it could to respect international covenants concerning the status of children and civilians in armed conflicts, Canada abstained "because [the resolution] does not acknowledge that the current conflict has taken a toll on both Palestinian and Israeli children."

But this position is not satisfactory. It reflects Ottawa's practice of applying a moral equivalency between Palestinian terrorist atrocities on the one hand, and Israeli defensive measures on the other hand. It also begs the question as to why Canada did not join Israel, the United States, the Marshall Islands, Micronesia and Palau in casting a "no" vote against the resolution. Canada should have acknowledged the fact that if it were not for premeditated Palestinian terror attacks against Israeli schoolbuses and young children and their mothers in their beds, there would be no Israeli army retaliatory operations in which Palestinian children are sometimes tragically and inadvertently wounded or killed. Canada also should have compared the sincere remorse expressed by Israeli leaders when Palestinian children are caught in the crossfire to Arafat's cynical disregard of the cold-blooded murder of Israeli children by Palestinian terrorists (to say nothing of Palestinian society's celebration of such "legitimate acts of national liberation" and the glorification of "martyred" teenaged Palestinian suicide bombers).

As a country that prides itself on its commitment to morality, honesty and fairness, Canada must firmly oppose – not merely abstain on – declarations in international institutions that mischievously portray Israel as a country that targets Palestinian children as a policy, or that blame Israel alone for the deteriorating security situation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip without referring to the broader context within which events occur.

In continuing to support or register meaningless abstentions on biased and unconstructive resolutions, as it did with regard to the 20 Israel-related resolutions adopted at the 57th UN General Assembly, Canada is not only betraying its friendship toward Israel, it is also compromising its ability to make an uniquely Canadian contribution to international affairs.

Death by numbers

During the early months of this so-called Al-Aqsa intifadah, or as Natan Scharansky has more aptly termed it "the war against peace," there was hardly a newsreader who could refrain from comparing the casualty counts on each side of the conflict.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

As if dealing with some sort of macabre sport, such commentators would tot up the numbers like scores at a basketball game, and often express regret at the perceived asymmetries. It was as though they thought it somehow unjust that so relatively few Israelis were being murdered or maimed.

And though in the perverse mindsets of some, the asymmetries still seem to warrant more redress, the toll of innocent Israelis who have been killed or injured in terrorist attacks has increased alarmingly. The Jerusalem Post recently reported that 227 terrorist-related casualties involving Israelis have been documented since the start of this war against peace: 24 between September and December 2000, 85 in 2001 and 118 in 2002. There have been more than 600 fatalities and thousands have been injured.

The deaths have occurred at bus stops and on buses, in the streets and at malls, at army outposts and on university campuses, at pizzerias, hotels and discotheques. Victims have ranged in age from infants to octogenarians. Parents have lost children and children have lost parents. Holocaust survivors have lived to see their grandchildren die, and new olim seeking safe haven and a new life have seen their dreams shattered by a callous and unpredictable enemy.

Almost every segment of Israeli society has borne the brunt of Palestinian terrorism, and as the carnage continues and the Israeli economy spirals into the worst recession in its history, the full impact of the uprising may not yet have been fully realized.

Regrettably, the fundamentals have not changed for the better. Hamas, Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and countless others perpetrators of murder and mayhem remain as remorseless as ever, and, though significantly weakened politically, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and his corrupt cronies remain entrenched, intransigent and increasingly hostile.

Meanwhile, an indifferent world looks on, waiting expectantly for the next chapter in the ongoing saga of Israeli-Palestinian incompatibility. Also looking on, with pencils still sharpened, are the number-crunchers, ever eager to entice their audiences with exponentially rising death tolls.

So regardless of what sort of government squeezes into power in Israel in the next few weeks, there must be an urgent re-evaluation of current realities. The incoming leadership needs to dispense with dogma and parochial interests and begin to examine creative ways to deal with terrorism and the forces that promote it. Otherwise, the number-crunchers will have further triumphs to crow about.

The P factor

Paka-paka. The lips never stop moving. Paka-paka. The hot air flows from the mouth. Paka-paka. Opinions spew out for whoever will listen. Paka-paka.

In Israel's media-bombarded, overly politicized, highly opinionated, emotionally charged, ideologically divided society, paka-paka is part of life. Especially during an election campaign.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Paka-paka is the popular term Israelis use to denote the mix of self-important bombast, long-winded commentary and general yada-yada-yada heard so often throughout the nation. In a country where talking heads rule the air waves, where per capita cell phone use is among the highest in the world, and where almost every citizen feels he knows better than the prime minister, paka-paka is inevitable.

Lately, in the lead-up to this month's election, the "P factor" has gone into overdrive, and I don't mean just paka-paka. Pundits, pollsters, political publicists, the press and, of course, politicians themselves – pontificating paka-paka professionals all – have taken centre stage.

Since the election campaign began in November, first for party primaries and then for the Knesset itself, politics has had a stranglehold on the public agenda and dominated the print media. Never at a loss for words, columnists, political talk show hosts, panelists and countless other supposed experts debate endlessly… Why is Prime Ariel Sharon still so popular despite the sorry state of the nation and his failure to deliver on campaign promises from two years ago? Why has the campaign of Labor leader Amram Mitzna and his party failed to take off? The topics go on ad infinitum.

The Likud corruption scandal injected an exciting new element into the media's already obsessive coverage of political intrigues, imbroglios, shenanigans and other forms of jockeying for power. Adding to the torrent of paka-paka, every other day sees a new poll published with great fanfare.

This year, in deference to the country's depressed mood, the economic crisis and the fact almost nobody wanted this election in the first place, the Knesset tried to act accordingly. It decided, albeit reluctantly, that the hefty subsidy it gives parties from the public purse to help finance their campaigns would be reduced to a slightly less obscene level than usual. Still, the parties have produced millions of freshly minted posters, banners, billboards, bumper stickers, flyers, brochures, handbills, newspaper ads and other printed matter to compete for the public's attention. This in addition to the parties' official TV and radio propaganda blitz that began last week.

Some things just never change, such as the inane slogans, overworked clichés and airbrushed images of earnest-looking faces posing against the ubiquitous blue and white flag. It's so tired and predictable. So too are the obligatory buzzwords like "peace" and "security," repeated so often as to render them meaningless.

Such is democracy, Israeli style. And we all know what the result will be: another 120 Knesset members, long on ego and self-interest, but short on integrity, responsibility and accountability; another bloated, dysfunctional governing coalition to further alienate the public; another reminder that Israel is virtually ungovernable and will remain so until there is major electoral reform.

The current system is a crying shame, and almost everybody knows it. Hard not to. For years, in response to public outcry, politicians have paid lip service to the need for electoral reform. But – surprise, surprise – they never quite get around to legislating it for fear of risking their Knesset seats.

So far in the campaign, electoral reform has barely rated a mention. Only one party, Yisrael b'Aliyah, has actively addressed the issue in its platform and in recently proposed legislation.

Specifically, it calls for two main changes to make the Knesset more representative and accountable to the public. The first entails direct election of MKs who would represent a specific legislative district, as in most western democracies. Lawmakers would then report to their constituents as well as to their party's leadership.

The second proposal would raise the threshold that a party needs to enter the Knesset from 1.5 per cent to 2.5 per cent of the overall vote. This would prevent small, splinter parties from wielding inordinate power over coalitions and Knesset decisions, as they do now.

All pretty sensible stuff, but sadly still likely a long way off. What will it take for such change to ever happen? A lot more than just paka-paka.

Barak's comeback and Sharon's Watergate?

The Israeli election campaign provides another example to support Winston Churchill's observation that democracy is the worst form of government, except for all the others.

In Israel, as elsewhere, the personal interests of politicians and parties often dominate national interests, particularly during the insanity of election season. The good news is that the public is usually not taken in by the shenanigans of petty politicians, and, in the end, the collective wisdom of democracy prevails.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In Israel, the combination of corruption and ideological polarization obscure debate over substantive issues. And, since Israel is not Canada, there are plenty of these, including questions of war, peace and national survival.

In early December, indicators pointed to an easy and overwhelming victory for Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the Likud, with major defeats for Labor and Shas, which emerged as Israel's third largest party in 1999. Sharon's position improved after the former head of the Labor party, ex-defence minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, resigned from the unity government. Instead of forming a government dependent on the support of the more extreme hawkish and ultra-religious parties, Sharon wisely called early elections.

Sharon handily defeated a challenge from Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu for the Likud leadership, and Labor shoved Ben-Eliezer aside in favour of Amram Mitzna, whose support for renewed negotiations with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat has alienated many voters. In contrast, Sharon is widely viewed as a successful leader who has carefully used the right combination of force and diplomacy to stay out of Arafat's trap.

As a result, public opinion polls showed Likud far ahead of Labor, until disaster struck. Likud's very narrow system for choosing Knesset candidates (controlled by 3,000 self selected Central Committee members) was allegedly subject to corruption, and police investigations began. The party's ratings plummeted 20 per cent, and while Likud maintains a significant lead, the election is no longer a foregone conclusion.

In a belated effort to limit the damage, Sharon fired Deputy Minister Naomi Blumenthal, a party veteran who refused to co-operate with the investigation. But Sharon's son Omri and the underworld figures who manipulated the system remain untouched, at least temporarily, and the collapse has continued.

At the same time, however, Labor and Mitzna have not gained much from this abrupt reversal of Likud's fortunes, in large part due to the stigma of Oslo and its legacy of terror. Instead, the voters who abandon Likud are moving to other parties likely to support Sharon and the policies he has advocated as prime minister. These include Yisrael b'Aliyah (headed by Natan Sharansky), Yisrael Beiteinu and the National Religious Party. The largest in this group is likely to be Shinui, which also promotes a deep hostility towards Israel's haredim.

And while the 1999 elections were marked by the stunning growth of Shas, in part as a reflection of disenchantment with the failures of the larger parties, the 2003 vote is likely to reverse this outcome.

Many of the Sephardi voters who supported Shas are returning to the Likud, while younger Ashkenazi ultra-secular Israelis have apparently moved their protest votes from the either Labor or Meretz on the left to Shinui on the right. Thus, while the election campaign began amid calls for increased unity in the face of war and terror, it has become very divisive.

This situation, including the absence of strong and honest national leaders, is easily exploited by minor political operators and dreyers. In this vacuum, and despite his personality defects, Netanyahu remains the most likely successor to Sharon, while, believe it or not, in Labor, former prime minister Ehud Barak is also planning a comeback.

For Sharon, the best scenario would be a decision to postpone the elections in the face of the imminent war with Iraq. This would allow Likud to hold an open contest to choose a new slate and give the public a chance to forget the party's recent political calamities.

On the other hand, if, as is still likely, the vote takes place Jan. 28, experience shows that the damage will eventually be repaired. The right lessons are usually learned, at least until the next elections.

In short, and as bad as the political scene appears, the Israeli commitment to democracy and to national survival is much stronger than the power of the petty politicians.

The Kirshner File

First book catapulted him to fame

Seven years after the publication of Hitler's Willing Executioners, Daniel Jonah Goldhagen is immersed in the second, more hectic phase of his life.

Goldhagen was once just another young American scholar labouring in obscurity. "I was an academic working quietly," he said.

But since 1996, he has evolved into an international public figure. "Obviously there was a change. Yeah, a big change."

Being a person who greatly values his privacy, Goldhagen, 43, is not someone who revels in what passes for fame in the hushed groves of academe.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Yet ever since Hitler's Willing Executioners, he has had to deal with the demands of celebrity. And now, with the release of his perhaps equally controversial book, A Moral Reckoning: The Role of the Catholic Church in the Holocaust and its Unfulfilled Duty of Repair, published by Random House, Goldhagen must grapple with that nettlesome issue again.

Hitler's Willing Executioners was a pathbreaking, iconoclastic work that stirred debate and sparked a furor that has yet to subside.

"It exploded a whole set of myths and helped re-orient the field," he observed, referring to Holocaust studies.

Hitler's Willing Executioners theorized that ordinary Germans, having been imbued with an "eliminationist" anti-Semitism, participated in the Holocaust willingly.

In strong, crystalline prose, he indicted Germans of complicity in three institutions of mass killing: police battalions, work camps and death marches.

A spinoff of his award-winning 1992 Harvard PhD dissertation in political science, it was a decade in the making. Yet curiously enough, Goldhagen – the son of a Romanian Holocaust survivor and retired Harvard historian who himself has explored the Holocaust – stumbled upon the topic.

As he explained: "I never intended to write on the Holocaust, until I realized there were few books about the role of the perpetrators. That's when I started thinking of the question."

During the writing process, Goldhagen consulted his father, Erich, "a discussion partner." But, as he hastens to add, "The work is mine."

Thinking that his thesis might be of interest beyond the academy, he expanded it into a closely-argued volume, dedicated to Erich.

Translated into an array of foreign languages, including German, Hitler's Willing Executioners caused a sensation and triggered a trans-national debate.

Some hailed it as a breakthrough in scholarship. Simon Schama of Harvard called it "astonishing, disturbing and riveting." Time magazine heralded it as "explosive."

However, Richard John Neuhaus, the editor-in-chief of the academic journal First Things, was far less charitable, saying that Goldhagen had misrepresented the pre-Nazi history of Germany, ignored the realities that prevented effective German resistance to Hitler's diabolical plans, and promoted a "deterministic view of history." In closing, he dismissed Hitler's Willing Executioners as "an incoherent, hateful and dishonest tract."

In an interview, Goldhagen dismissed the criticism – which must have wounded him deeply – as "self-condemnatory." The barbs, he said, misrepresented his narrative. And some critics, he noted, were motivated by professional jealousy and resentment.

What particularly incensed Goldhagen was the accusation that he had tarred the Germans with the brush of collective guilt. "It's a complete invention," he said.

Goldhagen, however, is pleased that several of his critics have since recanted and accepted his conclusions.

Love it or hate it, Hitler's Willing Executioners was a runaway bestseller. Around the world, 750,000 copies have been sold, an astounding sales figure, all the more so for a scholarly inquiry on the Holocaust.

Asked if it has made him financially independent, he bristled, flatly refusing to discuss his royalties.

Shortly afterward, Goldhagen left Harvard, though he is still affiliated with its Minda de Gunzburg Center for European Studies. "I just decided I wanted to write full time."

Stepping out of the limelight, he began working on a book about genocide in the 20th century. "It's an attempt to understand why there has been so much killing in the last century," he explains. "It's a synthetic work about genocide."

Goldhagen thinks he understands why the 20th century is so soaked in blood, but he is not ready to discuss his book-in-progress, which he expects to finish by the summer.

When he was midway through writing the yet-untitled book, the publisher of the New Republic, Martin Peretz, asked Goldhagen for an essay about the newest historical works on the Catholic church and the Holocaust.

Dissatisfied with the quality and tenor of the works he had read, he resolved to write a book "expanding the notion of restitution and repair from money to a discussion of the moral issues."

Unveiled at the recent Frankfurt Book Fair, A Moral Reckoning chronicles the Roman Catholic church's embrace and dissemination of anti-Semitism and recommends practical ways in which it can make amends.

It is a hard-hitting volume.

He claims that the church laid the foundation for Nazi anti-Semitism and provided the motive for many Europeans to support, and take part in, the persecution of Jews.

Daniel Jonah Goldhagen

Zeroing in on Germany, Goldhagen contends that the church supported the 1936 Nuremberg laws, which disenfranchised and marginalized German Jews.

And in a rebuke to Vatican assertions that Pope Pius XII worked tirelessly on behalf of Jews, he shows that the pontiff was, in fact, guilty of criminal acts.

Saying that "moral repair" is an unavoidable moral imperative rather than an option, Goldhagen urges the church to stop whitewashing the past and to confess to its anti-Semitic crimes.

The church, he argues, must delete anti-Semitic references in its sacred texts, especially the New Testament, and accept Judaism as a legitimate path to God and salvation.

And, he notes, symbolic acts are not enough.

Summing up his book as "a plea for serious moral discussion and reckoning," he acknowledges that it contains no new facts. "It is not an encyclopedic examination of the subject. It frames questions differently."

He is convinced that the church can rehabilitate itself by following its traditional messages of love and goodness.

Having said that, he allows that the church has made considerable progress since Vatican II in the 1960s and is no longer trying to provoke enmity against Jews.

On the day I interviewed Goldhagen, by sheer coincidence, the Associated Press reported that Cardinal Walter Kasper, a top Vatican official, had urged Catholics and Jews to heal their divisions and work toward reconciliation.

Much to Goldhagen's regret, the church has not greeted A Moral Reckoning with any great enthusiasm. The bishop of Hamburg endorsed its principles, but the head of the German Bishops' Conference denounced it as an "agitator's pamphlet."

Responding to such harsh judgments, Goldhagen said there are elements in the church who are desperately attempting to delegitimize his book.

"They're either not reading it, or they are lying about it."

Critics, so far, have been of two minds.

Kirkus Reviews praised A Moral Reckoning as "a skillful, persuasive blend of history and polemic, sure to incite controversy and to earn its author much attention."

But in The Globe and Mail, Michael Marrus, a renowned historian of the Holocaust, trashed it as "an ambitious work, deeply flawed by [Goldhagen's] selective use of evidence, a sneering disparagement of his opponents and a righteous indignation that blinds him to historical complexity."

Waving aside Marrus' withering appraisal, Goldhagen retorted, "He has nothing of substance to say. He essentially engages in apologetics for the church."

Goldhagen believes his book is a balanced account that draws attention to the church's shortcomings but also recognizes the Vatican's courage in rectifying its position toward Jews.

Although he has delved deeply into the Holocaust, he maintains he is not obsessed by it.

"This material doesn't consume my life. I'm happy not to talk about it if the topic is not raised. There are lots of other things I think about."

Such as basketball. Goldhagen is a Boston Celtics fan and a season ticket-holder.

Nor is he concerned about Holocaust deniers. "They won't change the understanding of the Holocaust in the public domain, which is secure. But one needs to be vigilant."

Life After 4 P.M.

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

Life at Associated does not end with afternoon dismissal. To enrich our children's experience, we provide supplementary programmes not available during the school day. Some of these, like the Bible Quiz, choir and Zimriya (Israeli song festival), and Rikudiya (Israeli folk dance festival) are perennial favourites. Other specialty programmes available are chess, Yiddish, silk painting, arty party, court sports, hip hop, tae kwon do, floor hockey, mad science, and techno-mania. These highly successful "After 4" programmes take place at the school from 4-5 pm. The children benefit from much needed fun activities, while saving the parents from extra driving.

Jewish law and conflicts of interest

Guest Voice

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

John Greedyman has recently been awarded rainmaker of the year for Merril, Money and Morality Inc. Interestingly, in 10 years at the company, he has only once issued a sell recommendation, which came one month after that company had hired another firm for an IPO (initial public offering). What are the rules governing potential conflict of interest?

In today's economy, we are forced to rely on others for information to make financial decisions. Purveyors of such information have a responsibility to make sure the information is accurate and that any advice they give is given with the client's best interests at heart.

Offering recommendations whose main purpose is the benefit of the advisor, to the detriment of the client, is a violation of the biblical prohibition of lifnei iver, placing "a stumbling block before the blind." This prohibition forbids offering ill-suited or misleading advice to the person relying on you to "see" for them. What is relevant in assessing the behaviour of the advisor is not the outcome of the advice, but rather the intent at the time it was given. If one's advice suddenly changes due to a changed fee structure, then one is likely in violation of this edict.

Thus, advising a conservative client to place the bulk of his assets in a speculative high-tech fund, which offers higher commissions to the broker, would run afoul of this prohibition even if the returns were spectacular. Advising the same client to invest in a "blue-chip" fund (do any still exist?) that ended up dropping 50 per cent would in itself entail no moral wrong.

All humans can do is give advice they consider appropriate in a particular circumstance – only God can determine the results. Of course, one can never know the intent of others and thus, immediately following this directive, the Torah adds the phrase, "and you shall fear God." While good marketing may enable a firm to have a stellar reputation, God is not so "easily fooled."

While a conflict of interest may give rise to a potential violation of this edict, there is nothing inherently wrong with an advisor having a conflict of interest, provided it does not cause him to alter his advice. In fact, conflicts of interest are inherent in all modern advisory roles, be they real estate agents, stockbrokers, investment bankers, lawyers, accountanst or even doctors.

While one may truly derive satisfaction in helping others, one's own economic welfare is a major motivating factor in doing one's job. This is unavoidable – in fact, it is part of human nature – and thus, attempts to totally eliminate conflict of interest have by and large failed. Therefore, Jewish law would not automatically ban many of the conflicts that secular law is so concerned about. Auditors would be allowed to offer consulting work, the Arthur Andersen scandal notwithstanding. What Jewish law would demand is that these potential conflicts of interest be publicized, leaving it up to the clients to decide whether they nevertheless want to accept the advice.

In seeking to balance the inherent competitiveness of the market and its zero-sum game nature, Jewish law places a measure of responsibility on the recipient of the advice to investigate on his own. Participants in business are expected to have some knowledge of the business environment and they cannot naively pass off all responsibilities to their investment advisors.

It is this premise that allows Jewish law to distinguish between an advisor and a judge. A judge is disqualified even if the slightest conflict exists, even if the conflict is revealed. His judgement is bound to contain slight biases despite efforts at impartiality. And when a judgment is issued, one must act according to it. But the advisor's role is only to advise – it is up to the advisee to act on that advice as he sees fit, taking into account the potential biases that may exist.

While Halachah would not insist on placing a "Chinese wall" between the investment arm and research arm of brokerage houses, society has the right to do so. However, one must be aware of the inherent weakness of such an approach. A better approach, though not guaranteed, is to choose to the best of your ability those who demonstrate (or appear to demonstrate) honesty, impartiality and integrity, and to ensure that all employees have ongoing training in ethics.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Israeli Jews are dying. Families are being blown to bits – physically, emotionally and psychically. We have the whole wretched panoply of newsreel misery out there for the viewing – babies, the elderly, males, females, young, old, religious, secular, leftists, right-wingers, settlers, Tel Aviv urbanites – all united by being in the proverbial "wrong place at the wrong time." What an oddly misplaced phrase! In Israel there are no privileged locations or secure minutes. All is under siege – life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, the meaning of meaning. No understanding emerges from any political development, from any promised respite.

Depicting a water clock, Maimonides observes that only the artisan who fashioned it knows precisely how it works and can predict its movements. The same is not the case with someone coming along at a later time and examining the apparatus: "The onlooker is incapable of knowing any of these motions before they take place, for he only knows whatever he knows on the basis of what takes place" (Guide of the Perplexed, 3:21). Such is the case today with Israelis, who despite security fences, strenuous military and police efforts, security guards and lots of private vigilance, can never know what is to come.

To put matters as plainly as possible, it's a frightening world out there. We in the post-Holocaust era had almost come to see ourselves as anomalies, not really fitting into Jewish history's almost unbroken narrative of death and persecution. It is still possible to see ourselves as living in a blessed time, free from fear and anguished perplexity. But to do this now takes a willful effort in atomization, to feel divorced from events that take place elsewhere. One has to work very hard these days to be that passive.

But we in North America are pulling it off. As a friend of mine sardonically remarked a year ago, Jews are good at "putting together dinners." We get speakers, dress up in our finest, raise lots of cash and feel a glimmer of long-distance patriotism. It isn't that this is a bad thing, but, to slightly rework Vince Lombardi's famous phrase, it isn't the only thing. Such secluded and adult events make no impact on those who need – perhaps even more than we do – to understand and care about what is happening to Israel – our children. Our future.

There's not much outcry these days about Israel. Any embryonic rage mustered in the wake of 9/11 and the initial spate of suicide bombings seems to have passed into a kind of foggy, backburner numbness. And an adult's listlessness has a powerful way of translating into a child's inertness.

And so, a modest suggestion, albeit shorn of any Swiftian irony. There are thousands of children who go to Jewish schools across Canada. Would it really upset the educational gods if every single one of those Jewish schools were closed on a designated day and every single one of those Jewish children rallied in the streets of their cities? Not on a Sunday, but right in the middle of the week, in instructional prime time.

Is there not a point where books must be shelved and children must be given an orienting moment about what we live for and what others are dying for? And is that moment not right now?

Israeli elections – Part 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, I continue our tour of the parties that hope to be part of the Israel's 16th Knesset when voters go to the polls on Jan. 28. Unless otherwise noted, all sites include some information in English.

Under the leadership of MK Amir Peretz, Am Echad (One Nation) sees itself as a workers' rights party, a true labour party. "The party will work towards progressive labour legislation and just social legislation, with a view to creating the proper balance between economic and human wealth." [http://www.am1.org.il/english.html] While virtually all political parties in Israel release information in Hebrew, Russian and English, I found it interesting that Am Echad is also courting Ethiopian immigrants to Israel and has created a Web page in Amharic. [http://www.am1.org.il/amharit.html]

The Likud Web site presents a history of the party, its philosophy, its youth movement and some online surveys. There is even a page where you can make an online donation in amounts ranging from 100 to 10,000 shekalim. However, I found the most interesting section is the Youth Forum with its lively debate about the Likud's policies and the scandal the party is facing. One message suggests that to save the party, Ariel Sharon must get rid of all the candidates who were chosen in an "unkosher" manner – including Sharon's son Omri. Another responds that the media, particularly the "leftist" Galei Tzahal radio station is responsible for perpetuating stories about the scandal. The site has a few pages in Russian and none in English. [http://likud.org.il/]

Meretz, the Israeli Social Democratic and Peace-seeking party, "is a democratic peace-seeking party, in which Arabs and Jews work together. Meretz is fully committed to human rights, equality, social justice, Israel's security, and to the values of humane Zionism." Like most other sites, Meretz presents its platform and biographies of its candidates. However, part of the Meretz site is directed at Jews living outside Israel who are encouraged to join the World Union of Meretz.

Meretz and its community homes abroad promote the study of Hebrew, activities about the history of the Jewish nation and Jewish holidays, Bible, contemporary poetry and literature. Meretz is taking this initiative because it feels that "In the 21st century, the greatest dangers facing Jewish culture are… ignorance and the lure of cultural globalization, and on the other hand, the ultra-Orthodox tendency in Judaism." [http://www.meretz.org.il/English/]

The graphic on the HaIchud HaLeumi Web site reads: "Wipe out terror. Bring back hope to Israel." The HaIchud HaLeumi (National Union) under Avigdor Lieberman is actually a combined list of Lieberman's Yisrael Beiteinu, Benny Elon's Moledet and Zvi Hendel's Tkuma. The party pledges that "another political entity will not rise between Jordan and the [Mediterranean] sea." In order to achieve true peace, the Palestinian refugee problem must be solved. "The proposed solution is transfer by agreement [population exchange] by which the refugees would be settled in Arab countries in place of Jews who emigrated to Israel from these countries." The site is in Hebrew, Russian, English, Amharic, Spanish and Arabic. [http://www.leumi.org.il/en/]

There are actually two "green" parties vying in the coming election. Despite Israel's security problems, HaYerukim (the Green party) says the country has a responsibility to deal with its huge ecological problems. Some of the issues that the party has tackled include air pollution, the placement of cellular antennas, construction along Israel's shores and the decreasing level of the Dead Sea. The Green party's Hebrew-only Web site has a large graphic of a man walking inside a sun above the party's slogan "Defending the Land." [http://www. green-party.org.il/]

Although most political parties in Israel concentrate on political and economic issues, there is one party that has a different focus. Aleh Yarok (Green Leaf) promotes the legalization of cannabis in addition to a platform dealing with civil rights, personal freedom and ecology. The Aleh Yarok Web site is in Hebrew only but you can read up on the party's policies in a Jerusalem Post article. [http://makea shorterlink.com/?A1EE219F2] Although most pollsters don't consider Aleh Yarok a serious contender, in the last election, the party received just over one per cent of the popular vote and was just 15,000 votes short of gaining a seat in the Knesset. [http://ale-yarok.org.il/]

Ringing in the new year with reading and books

Facing a new year is like standing at the rail of a ship that is leaving a great city late at night for an unknown destination. As it passes the last remaining lights along the shore and then swings out into the darkness, the heart is filled with anxiety and wonderment. There are storms and rocks out there. Who knows what lies ahead? But there is no alternative, no turning back.

As we travel into the unknown future, voyagers together, we would be wise to cultivate our interest in books and reading, for they bring an added measure of knowledge, enjoyment, comfort and wisdom to our lives.

The following brief quotations on reading are apt and provocative.

"I believe books will never disappear. It is impossible for it to happen. Of all mankind's diverse tools, undoubtedly the most astonishing are his books… If books were to disappear, history would disappear." – Jorge Luis Borges

"Be careful about reading health books. You might die of a misprint." – Mark Twain

"The man who does not read good books has no advantage over the man who can't read them." – MT

"Common complaints are that children's books, especially high quality picture-books, cost so much. All I can say is that they cost less than a dinner out, or a new pair of jeans. The books I read as a child transformed me, gave meaning and perspective to my experiences, and helped to mould whatever imaginative, intellectual or creative strengths I can lay claim to now. No doll or game had that impact on me, no pair of jeans ever changed my life." – Michelle Landsberg

"You make an acquaintance with a book as you do with a person. After 10 or 15 pages, you know with whom you have to deal. When you have a good book, you really have something of importance as friends and maybe more." – Shimon Peres

"From the moment I picked up your book, I was convulsed with laughter. Some day I intend on reading it." – Groucho Marx

"Outside of a dog, a book is a man's best friend. Inside of a dog, it's too dark to read." – GM

"I find television very educating. Every time someone turns the set on, I go into the other room and read a book." – GM

"If you don't like the book, you do not have to read it. Put it aside and read something you do like, because there is no reason at all why you should read what bores you during your serious reading time. You have to read enough boring stuff in the ordinary way of life without extending the borders of ennui. But if you do like the book, if it engages you seriously, do not rush at it. Read it at the pace when you can pronounce and hear every word in your own head. Read eloquently." – Robertson Davies

JVS online mentoring system project aids immigrants

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Argentine immigrant Viviana Kohon attributes her successful job search last year partly to luck and partly to her use of CanadaInfoNet, an online mentoring service launched a year ago by JVS Toronto (Jewish Vocational Service).

Kohon, 27, was a senior producer for a national television news program in her native Buenos Aires before she immigrated here with her husband in November 2001. She came across www.canadainfonet.org while searching the Internet for Jewish sites.

Since the Web site went live on Jan. 7, 2001, the project has facilitated 250 individual mentor-protégé relationships and served a total of 550 clients, some of whom have taken part in a "newcomer network" consisting of a 12-week virtual training program. One hundred seventy-five volunteer mentors have taken part in the project.

Joanne Collins, who wrote some of the Web site content and also served as Kohon's mentor, worked in broadcasting for six years before retraining as a career counsellor. She learned of the project from Anat Wertheim, JVS' director of newcomer and employment services and originator of CanadaInfoNet, whom she knew from the time she had worked for JVS a few years ago.

"I had worked with a lot of new Canadians," Collins told The CJN. "I learned firsthand how difficult it is [for them]. I've seen the struggles."

Mentors commit to helping their protégé – an immigrant of less than two years or someone who is planning to immigrate – for three to six months. All correspondence is anonymous and takes place via specially assigned e-mail addresses.

Site has served 550 clients since its launch

Most of the site's clients have been in the information technology field, but there have also been job-seekers in fields like marketing, finance, medicine and music, said Amanda Harris, CanadaInfoNet's project manager. Many hail from countries like China, Israel and Argentina, with smaller representations from Great Britain, Australia and other places, she added.

"We're always looking for mentors," said Harris. "We need people who have experience working in Canada and are at least a little bit familiar with the challenges newcomers face. A lot of our mentors are former immigrants. A lot are not, but they're still effective."

Mentors themselves receive support and ideas to help them help their protégés.

For Kohon – a go-getter who began working at a local coffee chain shortly after immigrating – the online service was most helpful in terms of improving her résumé and cover letter. "[Collins] helped me a lot with my original cover letter and how to make it more appealing for the Canadian market – the Canadian media market in particular."

Within six months of arriving here, she landed a position at the Discovery Channel, where she works as an associate producer for a daily science show.

Collins was impressed by how quickly Kohon was able to secure work in her field, but noted that, unlike some immigrants, Kohon did not have to write exams or undergo retraining.

"Viviana probably had an easier time [than many other immigrants]," said Collins. "I think she was really well qualified and had some amazing experience. She was also a pretty good communicator in English."

Kohon lauded JVS' initiative in launching the service. "I think it's great that they're doing this... Toronto is such a multicultural city."

Collins said the program "will have a definite return on investment for everyone. It helps our economy. It makes for a better community, and it helps immigrants feel like they're part of the community."

"I was very fortunate [in my job searches] in that I was born here," said Collins, "so I didn't have a lot of struggle other than the regular ones everyone has. New Canadians have additional hurdles."

Having mediated a focus group of the project's mentors, Collins said they "really feel a sense of giving back." And although their time is limited, using e-mail gives them the flexibility to participate. "It's really enriching to help someone else get on their feet. That's an incredible gift you can give to somebody."

There are many banquet halls.

Doubling Your GIC Returns

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 9% Plus

With interest rates at their lowest level in 40 years and stock markets in the doldrums, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free returned to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield.

The following example, compares the investment of $200,000 invested in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a male aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	10,000	22,833
Taxable Income	10,000	3,405
Tax (46%)	4,600	1,566
After Tax Income	5,400	21,267
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,222
Spendable Income	5,400	10,045
Gross Equivalent Yield	5%	9.30%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

*If income postponed until January 7, 2004, gross equivalent yield 10.85%

(This is an illustration only; rates will vary)

Some recent cases closed:
$900,000 Annuity — Gross Equivalent Yield 11.49%
$500,000 Annuity — Gross Equivalent Yield 13.46%

Adath Israel singles group launches new season

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Dynamic Singles of Adath Israel, which has been bringing Jewish singles together for nearly a decade, is kicking off its first brunch of 2003 on Jan. 26 with jazz pianist Ron Davis.

"At Adath Israel, we feel we should provide some way to help Jewish singles meet each other," said Judith Weinroth, chair of the Dynamic Singles committee at the synagogue. "Despite the fact that there are thousands of Jewish singles in Toronto, it's still hard to meet people."

The singles brunches are held once a month on Sunday and feature entertainment or guest speakers.

Some Jewish singles are reluctant to go to singles events sponsored by synagogues, Weinroth said.

"It's interesting that there are a lot of people who are willing to put a profile on the Internet, but are unwilling to go to Jewish singles events," she said.

Weinroth said Adath Israel's Sunday singles brunches usually attract about 60 to 100 people, adding that she would like to see those numbers double.

"My goal is to make sure we have quality programming in a comfortable environment and that we increase our attendance and eliminate the stigma about going to Jewish singles events," she said.

Adath Israel's upcoming brunch is also a pre-launch party for The Ron Davis Trio's new CD, So Much. A professional musician since the 1970s, Davis practised law until 2002, but now devotes himself full time to his music.

"It's one-tenth the income of law, but 10 times the satisfaction," Davis said of his music.

His first CD, soloduotrio, received wide acclaim in the music industry and was played on CBC, Jazz-FM 91.1 and CKLN. His second CD has received positive reviews and has been played on CBC.

"We're very proud of this CD and we're glad other people are seeing what we put into it," Davis said. He describes it as a "mix of well-known and lesser-known tunes."

Davis is planning a European tour, during which he hopes to make a stop in Israel.

He said he's thrilled to take part in the singles brunch at Adath Israel.

"Dynamic Singles is an exciting event," he said. "We're privileged to do a pre-release launch of our CD."

Dynamic Singles is part of Intersynagogue Singles of Greater Toronto, a group that was formed about five years ago. Chaired by Helen Lightstone, it has representation from other synagogue singles groups and is trying to reach out and encourage more participation by providing a range of programs.

The synagogues co-ordinate their events through Intersynagogue Singles, and each tends to specialize in certain types of programs. For example, Beth Tzedek regularly hosts an oneg Shabbat for singles, Shaar Shalom holds singles dances and Adath Israel holds its monthly Sunday brunches.

Other participating groups are from Beth Sholom, Temple Sinai, Holy Blossom, Har Zion, Kolel, Beth Torah Congregation and Temple Solel in Mississauga. There are usually three or four singles events held each month.

For more information, or to attend the Jan. 26 brunch, call Nilly Korn at 416-635-5340.

Torah scholar Bryna Levy coming to Toronto

Popular Tanach teacher Bryna Levy will be coming to Toronto to give a lecture and two women's classes on Jan. 29 and 30.

Her program is being sponsored by Torah in Motion, an organization that deals with the challenges for Judaism posed by modernity, and Mekorot, an institute of advanced Torah study for women.

Levy, who earned her PhD at Yeshiva University, has taught at McGill University, Yeshiva University and Michlala in Jerusalem. She now teaches at Jerusalem's Midreshet Moriah and is director of the graduate program in Tanach at Matan, the Sadie Rennert Women's Institute of Torah Studies.

Her community lecture, "Nechama Leibowitz z'ts'l: the Teacher, the Legacy" will be delivered at Beth Jacob Congregation, 147 Overbrook Place, on Jan. 29, at 8 p.m. Cost is $10.

Her women's classes, collectively titled Wrestling with God and Man, are being held at Shaarei Shomayim congregation. The first, Wrestling with God: Yaakov and the Angel will be Jan. 29 from 9:15 a.m. to noon, and Wrestling with Man: Avraham and Sodom, is on Jan. 30 from 9:15 a.m. until noon.

Cost is $36 for both sessions, or $20 for one. To register, call Torah in Motion, 416-633-5770, or Mekorot, 416-398-1510, or visit www.torahinmotion.org or www.mekorot.ca.

Portrait on display for limited time at AGO

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

There is something about Emil Gartner's portrait by Barker Fairley – maybe it's the eyes – that almost foretells the tragic end to his life two years later.

The Viennese tenor and conductor was 24 when he arrived in Canada from Austria in 1938, and 46 when he died in a car crash on Highway 401. During his 22 years in Toronto, Gartner led the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir (TJFC) to the height of its career.

The Fairley portrait, which was recently acquired from a private collection by the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO), will be on display publicly for for one day on Jan. 22. The gallery has not made plans for its permanent installation.

Artist and writer Barker Fairley (1887-1986) was born in Yorkshire, England, came to Canada in 1910, and became one of this country's most well-regarded scholars on German literature. Over the course of his career, he established close ties with the Group of Seven and painted numerous landscapes and portraits of relatives and friends, which included many of the intellectual and artistic leaders of the time.

In 1957, Fairley completed the Gartner painting, of which he later wrote, "It is the best, the strongest thing I ever did."

AGO associate curator of Canadian art Anna Hudson described the portrait as one of Fairley's most powerful works, full of raw emotion and humanity.

"The painting seems to be alive and Gartner almost seems to shift in his seat," Hudson said.

"Fairley managed to capture the intensity of the man. The shadows are as tangible as the flesh so that it almost appears to be a figure moving in space.

"It is clear that Fairley, who was a humanist in his thinking, really connected with Gartner," Hudson said.

Gartner's daughter, Esther, a cellist for the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO), was only 12 when her father died.

"Very little is known about my father's life before he came to Canada," Esther said in an interview.

"I know that he grew up in the Second District of Vienna and that he was a klakker [a paid clapper] in the Viennese Opera House," she said, adding that she believes most of her father's eight or nine siblings and his mother, Raizl, died in the Holocaust.

Two brothers, a sister and Emil's father, Samuel, who was already living in New York, survived, she said. It was Samuel who sent one ticket to Austria in 1938, which allowed Emil to escape.

"My father wasn't very close with his father," Esther said. "He [Emil] struggled all his life with the fact that the others didn't get out. It wasn't easy for him."

Esther's mother, Fagel Freeman Gartner, was a Yiddish teacher who taught Emil the language. She was also the choir's piano accompanist.

Esther remembers that her father was fluent in Yiddish, spoke English with only a slight trace of an accent and recalls that he was always immersed in a book or an intense discussion.

"But the choir was the focal point of his life," she said.

At that time, the TJFC was at the centre of Toronto's musical scene. Artists such as Jan Peerce, Paul Robeson and Lois Marshall performed with the choir and the TSO at Massey Hall, and the choir premiered works by some of the greatest composers of the day, such as Shostakovitz's Song of the Forest, his first major work for choir and orchestra.

The choir's origins are often traced to a group of immigrant factory workers who began performing annual spring concerts in 1926 under Hyman Riegelhaupt. The Young Socialist Choir (1914-1917) is also sometimes mentioned as a precursor to the current choir.

One of the TJFC's founding members, Ben Shek, remembers the changes Gartner made as soon as he became conductor.

From Barker Fairley Portraits, edited by G.M. Dault, published by Methuen, 1981.

Before Gartner, the choir specialized in Yiddish folk and working class songs, Shek said. Gartner immediately introduced classical music on Jewish themes and the TJFC began performing pieces such as Handel's Chorus from Judas Macabbias and Verdi's Chorus of the Hebrew Slaves from Nabucco.

Gartner also brought in Canadian folk songs and commissioned works by Canadian composers such as John Weinzweig and Louis Appelbaum at a time when this was rarely done, Shek said. Later, international composers – Italian, Slavic, Israeli – were also included in the repertoire.

Benita Wolters-Fredlund, a University of Toronto student who is doing her PhD on the choir, said in an interview that Gartner chose music that delivered messages of freedom, human rights and reflected on the brotherhood of mankind, in line with the TJFC's association with the United Jewish People's Order, a political group that had close ties to the Communist Party of Canada in its early years.

The folk choir continues to perform today, although on a smaller scale. It will perform several pieces on Jan. 22 at the AGO's Walker Court from 7:30 p.m. to 8:30 p.m., including Elegy for Emil: In Memoriam Emil Gartner by Milton Barnes. Esther Gartner will also perform.

Graham urged to reprimand Lebanese envoy

Jewish groups are calling on Foreign Minister Bill Graham to reprimand Lebanon's ambassador to Canada for saying Zionists control 90 per cent of the Canadian media.

Such comments are unacceptable and insult Canadian values, said Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress. B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president, Frank Dimant, called the ambassador's comments "crude" and "not acceptable public discourse in this country."

Ambassador Raymond Baaklini drew criticism for remarks he made during an interview with the Arabic-language newspaper, Sada al Machric. Baaklini said Canada outlawed the political wing of Hezbollah because of pressure from "a Zionist party" that "controls 90 percent of the Canadian media." Baaklini's comments were reported last week in the National Post. In an interview with the Post, the ambassador did not backtrack from his remarks, but he said he might have phrased them differently if he were addressing English readers.

The Canadian Lebanese Human Rights Federation said it would also write to Graham to ask that Baaklini be admonished.

Tony Burman, the head of CBC News and Current Affairs, has agreed to debate Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel and the Palestinian territories, over the public broadcaster's coverage of the Middle East.

The debate will take place Jan. 19 on CBC News Sunday. Spector has been a vocal critic of the CBC's Mideast coverage, saying it is slanted in favour of the Palestinians. He challenged Burman to debate his contention that the network's reporting encouraged the anti-Semitic statements made by onetime national First Nations leader David Ahenakew.

אַרָרָט

הרהורים עם עמוס עוז

כמו שהבטחתי, אחזור מפעם לפעם לספר "סיפור על אהבה וחושך", כדי לחלק איתכם את התענוג הקסום הזה.
ואי אפשר בלי מעשה האהבה הראשון שלו כנער:
"אורנה היתה אישה כבת שלושים וחמש, יותר מאשר כפליים משנתי בלילה ההוא...והיתה לא מזמן, באמריקה, לאחר תרצאה ולפני קבלת-פנים, מתוך מעגל צפוף של שואלים ומתווכחים, ורחה אלי אורנה פתאום, ידוקת עיניים, נוהרת, ורק מעט מבוגרת משחיתה בימי נעורי...ואני כחלום קסם תחתכי באמצע המשפט, פילחתי לי דרך אליה, קִדפתי את העומדים בדרכי, זחפתי חצידה גם את חזקנה הבוהה שאורנה נְגלגלה לפניה בכיסא גלגלים, ונפסחתי וחיבקתי אותה ואמרתי פעמיים את שמה...
היא ניתקה ממני בתנועה רכה, חצביעת על כיסא הגלגלים ואמרה באנגלית: זאת אורנה. אני רק חבת. לצערי, אמא שלי כבר לא מדברת, וכבר גם לא כל כך מכירה...."

סרטים שחבל, שאפשר או רצוי להחמיץ

זוהי עונת טרום האוסקר, וכל האולפנים מוציאים את מה שהם מקווים יביא להם את התהילה. כמות הזבל שמסתובבת על המסכים היא פנומנאלית, אז כדאי לחיזהר.

The gangs of new york הן שלוש שעות של שחיטה לשם שחיטה ללא שום תוכן או מסר. מדהים שאף אחד בחוליווד לא חשב שכדאי גם לכתוב תסריט. שלא תעיזו לתתקרב. שלוש בסולם קורן.

"שיקאגו"- שלוב חכם של מחזמר עם סרט. עלילת כמו שאמריקה אוהבת- קו פשוט, לא דורש מחשבה אך מבדר מאוד. יזכה באוסקרים אחדים. שמונה בסולם קורן.

Catch me if you can -ראיתי ספילברג או חייתי בטוח שיהיה כיף, אבל היה ככה ככה. סיפורו האמיתי של נער רב רמאי- שמתחזה לטייס, לרופא ולעורך דין, ואיש ח -סי אי איי שרודף אחריו. שבע בסולם קורן.

'Project Reconnect' unites Conservative youth alumni

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

With no fanfare – and a budget to match – a far-flung group of more than 50 volunteers from the Conservative movement launched an Internet-based project last year to reconnect alumni of United Synagogue Youth (USY) with other young adult programs.

The response – both from enthusiastic volunteers and via e-mail from many of the more than 5,000 registered alumni – has exceeded the expectations of the project's international chair, Jackie Saltz, who spoke to The CJN last week from her home outside Los Angeles.

"This whole thing is like a runaway train," she said. "We had no idea how badly people wanted this."

Saltz is an international vice-president of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), former synagogue youth director, semi-retired business owner, mother of two ex-USYers in their 30s, and coincidentally, a former staffer at Ontario's Camp Wahonawin when her name was Jackie Berman. She approached USCJ president Judy Yudof last February at the organization's international convention about setting up an alumni registry. Without Yudof's initiative and vision, Saltz said, the project wouldn't have gotten off the ground.

"Judy and I agreed that wherever we happened to travel, we kept bumping into [former] USYers... and they still have that energy and that smile on their faces when they recall those years."

Jerusalem-based Rabbi Paul Freedman, the first international president of USY and its national director from 1967 to 1991, offered his services as soon as he heard about the project at the convention. He and his wife have since hosted two reunions and there are plans for the Israel contingent to meet periodically, he wrote in an e-mail.

"The dialogue that our Project Reconnectniks here will engage in with their fellow alumni in North America will also help to strengthen Israel-Diaspora relationships at a time when such is needed," he added.

Although USY dates back to 1951, and programs like Nativ (a year-long program in Israel for university students) and Pilgrimage (an Israel summer program) also go back a number of decades, this project is a first, according to Saltz. "Individual regions had alumni groups, but nothing on this scale."

Because of the way the Web site is currently set up, with access restricted by geographic region, Saltz and Rabbi Freedman have served as intermediaries for alumni who want to locate someone from a different geographic region or about whom they don't have enough information to locate themselves. (The Web site is expected to be revamped soon.)

Aside from facilitating emotional online reunions and actual reunions like an upcoming regional one in Ohio this April, the project has served as an informal network, said Saltz. In one case, a lawyer passed on some work to a colleague in another state.

One alumna, now living overseas and herself the mother of a teenager, wrote that she doesn't miss much, but she does miss her friends from USY.

An offshoot of the project – still in the works, but expected to be online soon – is a Yellow Pages-type directory of alumni who have made aliyah. There is also a team working on a program to connect young adult alumni who are new to their communities with counterparts who can welcome and orient them. A pilot project with three test synagogues is in the works in hopes of connecting alumni to congregations, and Saltz said there is also talk of a 2004 mission to Israel.

For further information, go to www.projectreconnect.org, or e-mail Rabbi Freedman at nina_f@netvision.net.il. Alumni from Eastern Canadian region USY may also call Tamara Kochberg or Denise Gold at the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region office at 416-667-1717.

TU B'SHVAT PROGRAM: USDS Rosh Chodesh Buddying Program focuses on Tu b'Shvat. Grades 1 to 4 are partnered with grades 5 to 8. Students are paired for arts and crafts projects related to the holiday. The activities are open-ended in order to encourage originality. They teach the values of understanding, cooperation, and respect. The students in the photo are (from left) Maya Amar, grade 2 and Nicole Sieber, grade 5.

USY president puts Canada on the map

By SHIRA ZELIGER
Special to The CJN

Despite a relatively small voting contingent from his own United Synagogue Youth (USY) region, David Goldberg, 17, recently became the first Canadian elected international president of USY, the youth affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), at the 52nd International USY Convention in Orlando, Fla.

In a telephone interview last week, Goldberg, a Grade 12 student at Highland Secondary School in Hamilton, Ont., recalled his first regional USY convention four years ago, when graduating USYers joked about him being elected international USY president one day.

"Before I was elected, this was all just a dream," said Goldberg. "I'm surprised that I have accomplished this much."

He said it was "a nerve-racking experience" as president of the Eastern Canadian Region of USY (ECRUSY) – representing Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes – to run against presidents from regions with larger delegations.

"But if you want something like that, you have to believe that you can overcome the odds," he said.

"Making connections and forging friendships with people from other USY regions also helps," he added.

In fact, one of Goldberg's goals for his year as international president is to create a closer bond between the 17 regions of USY that span Canada and the United States.

"With the American regions making up the overwhelming majority of the total membership of USY, the Canadian USY chapters from coast to coast are often made to feel isolated," Goldberg said. "I want to help USY feel more international."

Goldberg doesn't believe this will be a problem, as the 53rd International USY Convention, planned for December 2003, will be held in Toronto – the first time since 1995.

"There is no doubt that Canada will be well represented this year," Goldberg said.

Goldberg also hopes to unite Jewish teenagers across North America from different denominations and backgrounds under Israel, their common tie.

"I hope to assist in building a strong bond among Jewish youth today to fight anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment, just as Jews from across the spectrum raised their voices about Soviet Jewry in the past," he said. "We will be most successful at promoting Jewish values by taking action and standing united."

Goldberg spent the summer of 2001 with 75 North American teens of different Jewish backgrounds and denominations through a program called Genesis at Brandeis University that projects and workshops on Jewish studies with arts and social action. He said the program increased his awareness of the importance of building a strong, pluralistic Jewish community.

Some of Goldberg's other goals include strengthening individual chapters, visiting different regions and spending time with USY groups on summer trips and helping today's Conservative Jewish teens become strong leaders of the Conservative movement as adults.

"Many members and leaders of USY often become either Orthodox or secular in their adulthood. I want to help preserve Conservative Judaism and ensure that USYers continue to strengthen the movement," he said.

Goldberg said he considers his grandfather, Rabbi Israel Silverman of Hamilton, and his great-uncle, Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Toronto, as role models.

"It is… my upbringing in a strong Conservative Jewish environment that has led me to where I am today," Goldberg said. "As well, it is thanks to the strong support of ECRUSY and many of the regions' past leaders."

This is not the first time that a Canadian has been elected to USY's international executive. ECRUSY's youth director, Tamara Kochberg, who served as international executive vice-president in 1994, and Nikki Greenspan, of Toronto, who served as both ECRUSY president and international Social Action/Tikkun Olam vice-president in the late 1990s, were role models for Goldberg, who expects to continue his involvement in the Conservative movement into adulthood.

"Perhaps rabbinical school," he said, "but I'm going to take one thing at a time."

Portrayal of Israel in and by the media

The CJN strives to be the very best community newspaper it can be. Our core activity, of course, is to provide the news from around the Jewish world, credibly, reliably and as comprehensively as possible, within the limitations of our resources and our weekly format.

The paper proceeds from the conviction that a better-informed Jewish community will be a healthier Jewish community and thus an asset to Canada at large and to Jewish communities around the world.

But our mandate calls upon us to stretch beyond our core activity from time to time.

As a result, some four years ago, we introduced an annual autumn CJN Roundtable and spring Town Hall Report as vehicles for the broader exploration of current issues of relevance to the community.

On Nov. 27 last year, the editorial advisory board of CJN convened a roundtable on the subject of The Portrayal of Israel in and by the Media. We invited Peter Beinart, editor of The New Republic, to deliver a keynote address on the topic. We also invited Tony Burman, editor in chief of CBC News; Jonathan Kay, editorial page editor of the National Post; and Paul Michaels, communications director of the Canada Israel Committee, to respond to Beinart and to conduct a discussion around the table.

What follows is a summary of the discussion that unfolded that day.

'Obsessive' attention to Israel, panel told

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The media devote an "obsessive" amount of attention to Israel in proportion to the rest of the world, says Paul Michaels, director of communications at the Canada Israel Committee (CIC).

The Middle East is home to only a small amount of the world's conflict, yet it gets a vast amount of attention, Michaels said.

He was responding to a talk by Peter Beinart, editor of the New Republic, at a recent roundtable discussion on the portrayal of Israel in and by the media sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News.

Also responding were Tony Burman, editor in chief of CBC News, and Jonathan Kay, editorial page editor of the National Post.

The bulk of the media's attention is on Israel and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Michaels said, and little attention is placed on Jordan, Egypt, Syria or Lebanon.

Because Israel also receives a disproportionate amount of criticism from the media, he said, it is in the consciousness of the world as no other country has ever been.

"The media [are] determined to stake out the moral high ground and see Israel as the oppressor, and the imagery that floods our television screens feeds into people's emotions," he said.

If these images are dwelt upon, said Michaels, "then that is what consumers of the news are left with. They think that Israel's occupation is the cause of the conflict."

The truth, he said, is otherwise. "The conflict is due to the Palestinians' rejection of Israel's very existence. The peace movement collapsed because they rejected Israel's offer of statehood, yet Israel gets blamed for all the violence."

Israel's case is very difficult, said Michaels. "How [can the media] capture the notion of Arab rejectionism? It can be done, but it is just more difficult.

"When journalists quote Hamas, among others, but do not state what they stand for, they grant them legitimacy before an audience that is incapable of understanding what Israel is going through.

"[The media are reporting] to an audience that is free of violence, and what Israel is confronted with is almost unimaginable to the audience."

We hear from Palestinian officials that suicide bombings are acts of desperation, Michaels said, "but the truth is that Palestinians have adopted the suicide bombings as a strategical choice, not out of desperation.

Paul Michaels

"There are many desperate people in the world who do not blow themselves up, and it is important for us to recognize the tactics used by the Palestinians. It is vital for the consumer to know all the issues," he said.

It is the burden of journalists to do their homework, Michaels said. "They often use phrases such as "illegal occupation" when in fact, Israel came into the territories legitimately in 1967.

"Journalists also use the term 'right of return' even though that right does not exist."

Sheer repetition of these stock phrases comes at Israel's expense, he said. "It is hard to change. It is a challenge, but it is not impossible."

When writing about the Middle East conflict, said Kay, many reporters make a judgment about whether or not it is a colonial struggle.

"If they decide it is a colonial struggle, then that trumps everything else. [Many people feel] there is no greater crime than colonialism.

"There is a large body of blacks in the United States who want reparations for things that happened centuries ago. The legacy of colonialism is powerful, and people underestimate how powerful that baggage is. It evokes skeletons of all past colonialism," he said.

It is brilliant Arab propaganda to always mention the "colonial occupation," Kay said. "That summons up everything that Palestinians want westerners to think about the conflict, and it is not difficult for a journalist to find a colonial argument.

"If they hang around a checkpoint long enough, they can always find a Palestinian who will complain to them. That feeds into the colonial mentality." he said.

In the United States, there is a divergence between Jewish opinion and mainstream liberal opinion, Kay said. "Mainstream liberals are receptive to the colonial narrative. We need a counter-narrative, and Jews have that narrative – pathological anti-Semitism."

Tony Burman

Terrorism is successful in one respect, he said. "Its goal is to divide people, and there is a split between those who believe in the colonial narrative and those who do not. That split is almost irreconcilable.

"In my mind, a deep-seated guilt associated with the colonial legacy will [perpetuate] a subtle sympathy for the Palestinian cause."

The problem with television news, Kay said, is that it is difficult to interview 10 people for a two-minute news clip. "That troubles me, because 75 per cent of the people get their news from the television."

There is a ray of hope, he said, in that many of his colleagues subscribe to such media services as Palestinian Media Watch and translated versions of Arab language press. "This is hopeful because people can see the hate that is peddled in Arab countries."

U.S. Jews moving right, commentator says

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the last two years, the Palestinian intifadah and the 9/11 attacks have spawned a rift between the American Jewish community and the liberal media, a rift that promises to grow as U.S. Jews increasingly shift their allegiance to conservative media and the Republican Party, says a leading political commentator.

We are now experiencing "a very explosive moment in Jewish politics," one that is rocking the traditional Jewish affiliation with the Democratic party and creating an undercurrent of anti-Semitism, said Peter Beinart, editor of the New Republic magazine.

Jews are feeling increasingly comfortable in the traditionally WASP-ish Republican party, which now features several prominent Jewish neo-conservative thinkers and an unreservedly pro-Israel constituency of Christian believers, Beinart said. At the same time, Beinart believes Jews are being blamed in some quarters for leading the charge for an American war with Iraq.

Beinart's wide-ranging analysis of the current state of American political affairs was part of a roundtable discussion that included The Canadian Jewish News' editorial advisory board. Focusing almost entirely on the United States, Beinart examined the American Jewish community's disillusionment with the left wing and the "liberal" media's analysis of the Mideast conflict.

On campuses, at anti-globalization rallies, in the portrayal of the Arab-Israeli conflict in the liberal media, Beinart said, the left has come to view Israel as "the forward phalanx of the American empire" and the Palestinian insurrection as a legitimate anti-imperialist struggle.

Special Report

'Tension a reflection of the times'

Burman acknowledged that a great tension exists between CBC and the Canadian Jewish community.

"This tension, however, could be more a reflection of the tension of the times rather than our journalism.

"CBC has a commitment to give a different perspective than Americans on certain stories. The Israeli story, in a way, has been part of American domestic politics in a way it has not been in Canadian domestic politics.

"The feeling at CBC is that we have to provide an understanding of the Israeli story almost as a counter to the American approach, which is influenced by waves and directions of American politics."

In the past few years, he said, CBC has devoted more resources to covering the Middle East than to any other area apart from the United Kingdom, and it has created an additional bureau in Cairo and has plans to open a bureau in Jordan. [Ed. note: The CBC recently opened a one-person bureau in Amman, after Burman spoke at the roundtable.]

"That is a reflection of what Canadian groups have criticized about the CBC – that we have not brought about a broader treatment of the wider Arab world."

The CBC has definitely made an effort to respond to "a complicated and nuanced subject, particularly for those who are not well-schooled in the background [of the region].

"I must stress that our efforts are well-intended. If we can get to a point in which we will have frequent dialogues, we would find that there is an agreement between CBC and Jewish groups as to the intent of our coverage," said Burman.

Jonathan Kay

For the left, the methods employed are of secondary importance to the otherwise justified anti-imperialist struggle, so the Palestinian use of suicide bombings is seen as no more than a "misguided tactic," Beinart said.

"This is the only anti-imperialist struggle going on in the world today and Israel is at the centre of it. You cannot be part of the anti-imperialist movement if you are not on the side of the Palestinians in their struggle against

Peter Beinart

Israeli occupation," Beinart said.

Beinart described how traditionally liberal U.S. Jews have recoiled from that view and how they are moving away from their traditional liberal affiliations.

Jews had been supporters of the Democratic Party since the1932 election of Franklin Roosevelt. That affiliation continued through the 1990s, even while their improved socio-economic status might otherwise have led most to the Republican Party, Beinart said.

Still, for most Jews, political identity in the 1990s was defined by the U.S. "culture wars." On issues such as abortion, gay rights and the separation of church and state, Jews as a group were further to the left than any other American constituency, he said.

When the culture wars peaked during the impeachment hearings of former U.S. president Bill Clinton, Jews overwhelmingly backed the president. The importance of the cultural conflict, however, fell dramatically following the onset of the intifadah and 9/11, and its waning undermined Jewish allegiance to the Democrats, Beinart said.

As Israel and the United States came under attack, it was the Christian right that stood solidly behind Israel. Concerns over other issues, such as abortion, have "dramatically receded in importance," he said.

What's more, long-standing neo-conservative Jewish supporters of the Republican party, who had been on the margins of the party, saw their prestige grow as their pre-9/11 views were seen as accurately describing subsequent events. People such as Richard Perle, Paul Wolfowitz, Bill Kristol and Doug Fife, who had been warning of a perennial American ideological struggle with the rest of the world, were vindicated and became important players in the administration of President George W. Bush, Beinart said. (Wolfowitz, for one, was named assistant secretary of defence.)

"The intellectual apparatus of neo-conservatism was seen as Jewish, even if that was not said in polite company," Beinart said.

The popularity of Fox Television, which often compares Israel's war on terrorism to America's, has also been "extremely important" in supporting the Jewish move to the right, Beinart said.

What's more, Jews who "did not feel culturally at home" at Republican events "because it was WASPy," now saw the party welcoming Jews. At his synagogue in Washington, Beinart said, Republican Jews felt comfortable enough to sport Bush/Cheney kippot to match the Gore/Lieberman yarmulkes worn by other members of the congregation. For Beinart, that's a significant indicator of the changing political climate.

Jews now feel there is a comfortable place for them

Still, there has been a backlash. On one occasion, Beinart said, a prominent TV executive told him prior to going on air that it was Jewish conservatives who were dragging the United States into a war with Iraq. "I took that to be a very culturally loaded statement," Beinart said, noting the executive ignored the many non-Jews advocating war. Callers to CSPAN, the U.S. political network, often complain the war on terror is a manifestation of Jewish power and control, he added.

* * *

During the 1990s, American Jews were part of a liberal consensus on international affairs that all conflicts could be resolved through peace processes, that questions of morality and historical justice were irrelevant to solving disputes and that differences needed to be split 50-50 in order to move forward, Beinart said.

"The signature phrase of this view was 'cycle of violence.'" he said. "There were Jews who chafed at this analysis because they didn't see Israel and the Palestinians as fundamentally the same... but in the 1990s, many Jews bought into this analysis."

American Jews were "stunned by how far [former Israel prime minister Ehud] Barak went at Camp David and at Taba," but if Israelis would have ratified any peace deal, they too would have been on board.

CBC editor defends Mideast coverage

The head of CBC News categorically rejects suggestions Middle East correspondent Neil Macdonald breached the network's own guidelines for fairness and balance. In fact, says the CBC's editor-in-chief Tony Burman, Macdonald has "done commendable work" in reporting on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"Overall, we are proud of our coverage of Israel and the Middle East," said Burman.

In a question period during The CJN's roundtable discussion, Burman fielded several pointed questions from members of The CJN's editorial advisory board, who suggested the CBC's news coverage was slanted against Israel.

Donald Carr, Sandy Brown, Irving Abella and Igor Korenzvit each sought Burman's views on the coverage. Burman responded that considering the difficulty of reporting from the region and given the heavy scrutiny the coverage receives, the CBC had done a good job in its reportage, though he acknowledged that Macdonald possesses "an aggressive style in a lot of ways."

Abella, a professor of history at York University, described the Middle East conflict as a four-reel movie "and the CBC plunks us into the third reel." He suggested the network's coverage lacks historical context.

Burman replied that even newspapers like the New York Times don't print much history, and he suggested Canadian viewers had options other than news reports to gather information about the Middle East, including the network's documentaries and other sources.

York Prof. Michael Brown noted a case in which Macdonald did make a historical reference in one of his news reports. During the Pope's visit to Israel, Brown said, Macdonald pointed to Israel's political leadership, noted it included many were ex-generals and then went on to call Israel "a militaristic state."

"Macdonald set a context 'nicely'. He did it by adding one phrase," Brown said.

Brown also questioned why the "colonial narrative" used by many reporters in describing the Middle East conflict hasn't been applied to other regional disputes, such as those in Kashmir or Timor.

Jonathan Kay of the National Post noted that Israel fits the stereotype of a colonialist power – rich, white, English-speaking and with women who appear Western.

Conflicts such as the civil war in the Democratic Republic of Congo, with an estimated 2.5 million dead, are ignored, Kay said, while the world focuses on Jenin, where a bogus massacre was reported last year by the Palestinians. That has less to do with the people being oppressed, he said, than with the people considered the oppressors – and Israelis are perceived as rich, white and Western.

Peter Beinart said alternative news sources are making inroads in the United States. Fox News is proving popular while talk radio, which tilts to the right, has attracted listeners looking for an alternative to the mainstream media. In addition, Internet "bloggers" ("Web logs," people who comment on the news) are filling the gap between liberal media and a more conservative audience, he said.

Responding to a question from Lou Ronson on the growth of anti-Semitism, Beinart said Jews are well represented in the centres of power in Washington and so "Jews are well set up to take the blame for any anti-elitist, populist elements in the United States," who don't see the need for a war with Iraq.

Special Report

Liberal media have changed

With the outbreak of the current intifadah, "this consensus started to crack. The liberal media have gone in one direction and the Jewish community has gone in another. The liberal media have gone left and the Jewish community has gone right."

Following 9/11, American media began asking what went wrong and why do they hate us? "The emergence of these two questions is at the heart of the way the American media looks to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and it has moved the American media to the left in the last year."

The political left, meanwhile, has also changed. Prior to 9/11, its primary concerns were economics and international institutions such as the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and the World Trade Organization. Israel was not on the left's radar screen.

But after 9/11, Beinart said, "the left was thrown back to the kind of left it was in the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s" with its focus turned to the "American empire."

Israel was seen as "the forward phalanx of the American empire" and the battle line was the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. That left-wing view, popular on campuses, "trickles down in a milder form to the liberal elites and the media," Beinart said.

"For the left, it is the Muslim world that is the only part of the world putting up opposition to American imperialism," he said.

Most Jews, on the other hand, saw parallels between the American and Israeli struggles against terrorism, with both countries' opponents – Al Qaeda head Osama bin Laden and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat – "fundamentally unappeasable and fundamentally illegitimate."

Furthermore, Jews perceived Palestinian suicide attacks as a symptom of a serious pathological disturbance in Palestinian society, a disturbance that made them question the legitimacy and goals of the Palestinian struggle.

To the left, however, "if you criticize that pathology, that smacks of racism… It's the level of analysis you don't find too much in the liberal media in the United States today, yet it's the central way of Jewish interpretation.

"For the liberal media, the legitimacy of the Palestinian cause can be separated from the legitimacy of the tactics the Palestinians are using to further that cause."

While Israel and the United States are now "joined at the hip" politically, their struggles remain fundamentally different. Israel is involved in a territorial struggle while the United States is fighting a war against terrorism that cannot be solved by a territorial compromise, he said.

Hebrew better among Montreal teens than Toronto

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Recently released statistics from the 2001 Canadian census on heritage languages indicate that Hebrew is doing better among teens in Montreal than among teens in Toronto, says Montreal researcher Jack Jedwab.

Montreal has a higher proportion of Jews in their late teens and early 20s who speak Hebrew as a second language – that is, learned primarily in school – compared to Toronto, Jedwab said in a recent interview.

In the age 15-19 category in Montreal, for example, for every person citing Hebrew as their mother tongue, there were 11 who could speak it as a second language.

But within the same age group in Toronto, for every person with Hebrew as their mother tongue, only about four speak it as a second language.

"In other words, as a second language, Hebrew is doing better in Montreal [within these age groups] than in Toronto," said Jedwab, the executive director of the Association for Canadian Studies and a former executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region.

In a sense, the opposite is true with Yiddish, albeit on a smaller scale, Jedwab said. For every Torontonian in the same 15-19 age group who claims Yiddish as a mother tongue, 2½ can speak it as a second language.

But in Montreal, the ratio is less than one-to-one, because so many more Montrealers in this age group speak Yiddish as a mother tongue – 530 versus 60 in Toronto.

To no one's surprise, the use of Yiddish has continued to decline, both nationally and provincially, mainly due to the high attrition rate among its elderly speakers.

The 2001 census results reported 19,296 Jews nationwide who claimed Yiddish as their mother tongue – defined as the language first learned at home and still understood – compared to the 21,420 figure reported in the 1996 mini-census – a 10 per cent decline.

Meanwhile, the number of Jews nationwide claiming Hebrew as their mother tongue has also dropped since 1996, from just over 13,000 to about 12,400.

Nationwide, 63,700 people said they could speak Hebrew and just over 37,000 said they speak Yiddish (as opposed to those languages being their mother tongue).

Hebrew is dominant because it is the main second language taught in Jewish day schools, Jedwab said.

"The dominance of Hebrew begins in the 10-to-14 age cohort and remains consistent to the age of 60," he said.

After age 65, he said, "Yiddish returns to the dominant position [nationally], as a reflection of that generation's roots to Yiddish versus the transition to Hebrew amongst the younger generation."

Jedwab said that in Quebec, Yiddish as a mother tongue continues to lead Hebrew by a wide margin. In Montreal, which accounts for most of the figures from Quebec, the numbers were 9,300 for Yiddish and about 3,000 for Hebrew.

The higher numbers for Yiddish are because of the community's high percentage of elderly European Jews and children from chassidic families who speak Yiddish at home, he said.

Jedwab noted that for the first time in Ontario, Hebrew was given as a mother tongue more often than Yiddish. Ontario now has slightly more Jews who speak Hebrew as their first language than Yiddish (7,935 versus 7,930, respectively).

Jedwab explained that since 1996, the number of people in Ontario citing Hebrew or Yiddish as their mother tongues dropped. But those listing Hebrew as their mother tongue dropped by less, allowing Hebrew to edge ahead.

Jedwab said despite what some might suspect, it is not the result of more Israelis moving to Canada.

"In fact, data from the Israeli Bureau of Statistics reveals that immigration from [Israel] has not been on the rise in recent years," Jedwab said, meaning there hasn't been a replenishment of Hebrew speakers in the province.

"Only outside Quebec and Ontario has there been an increase – however modest – in the number of persons of Hebrew mother tongue."

Blind spots and willful ignorance

Michael Ignatieff, the distinguished Canadian-born historian, writer and broadcaster, is director of the Carr Center at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University. He is also a contributing writer for the New York Times Magazine, where his article, "The Burden," about U.S. involvement abroad and especially its possible military intervention in Iraq, appeared in the Jan. 5 issue.

Ignatieff poses the question of whether the United States, a nation based on liberal democratic values, "can survive in safety at home without imperial policing abroad."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

He reluctantly supports "regime change" in Iraq, arguing that "the disagreeable reality for those who believe in human rights is that there are some occasions – and Iraq may be one of them – when war is the only remedy for regimes that live by terror."

Ignatieff does warn that a change in the Iraqi regime entails "reordering the whole region" and he lists Iran, Turkey, Syria and Saudi Arabia as countries the United States must approach cautiously. So far, so good, even if this vision is a bit sanguine.

However, problems emerge when Ignatieff links the success of his vision to the resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and makes it his central thesis. "Unseating an Arab government in Iraq, while leaving the Palestinians to face Israeli tanks and helicopter gunships, is a virtual guarantee of unending Islamic wrath against the United States."

Ignatieff describes Israel's defence measures as wantonly aggressive. "Now with every day that American power appears complicit in Israeli attacks that kill civilians in the West Bank and Gaza, and with the Arab nations giving their tacit support to Palestinian suicide bombers, the imperial guarantor finds itself dragged into a regional conflict that is one long hemorrhage of its diplomatic and military authority."

Ignatieff calls for enforcing a peace on the Palestinians and Israelis without considering whether the Palestinians and the broader Arab/Muslim world is actually prepared to accept the legitimacy of a Jewish state.

In advocating a Palestinian state, he ignores the fact that one was offered to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat two years ago. For Ignatieff as a historian, this omission is glaring.

True, Ignatieff acknowledges that there is a need for "a greater sense of security for Israel," and that regardless of any political settlement, Arab terrorists will remain committed to Israel's destruction.

But the idea that regional stability depends first and foremost on an Israeli-Palestinian concord is extraordinarily naive. Intra- and inter-Arab problems of enormous magnitude have long pre-dated the Palestinian conflict and will probably remain long after. In the meantime, Israel should not be made a sacrificial lamb in pursuit of an illusory peace.

* * *

The award for the least credible comment of the week goes to BBC Mideast correspondent Barbara Plett (heard on CBC Newsworld Jan. 5). Arguing that Palestinian Islamic extremist groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad should be distinguished from the Al Qaeda network, Plett said: "The case with the Islamic Palestinian groups is that they were formed in the occupied territories as a response to the occupation. They say they have, and they have by and large, limited their targets to Israeli targets. They have not gone beyond the occupied territories, and they say their goal is to free the West Bank and Gaza, not to attack the Americans or attack the West."

The Hamas charter clearly states that its aim is the creation of an Islamic state in the entire region. "Battling the occupation" is a code phrase for the destruction of Israel. It is not for one minute restricted to the West Bank and Gaza, as reporters familiar with the Middle East know, but very infrequently acknowledge.

Y Shabbat hours divide CJC executive

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Jewish Congress Quebec region (CJC) executive committee is divided over whether the YM-YWHA should open on Shabbat, as is now being considered.

A consensus could not be reached at a CJC meeting last week on what position, if any, Congress should take on the issue. The Y has invited community-wide input into its Shabbat policy review, which has been under way for the past several months.

CJC Quebec region president Joseph Gabay said he is strongly opposed to the Y being open to any type of activities on Shabbat.

He said that having a major institution like the Y open on Shabbat would undermine CJC's efforts to ensure that colleges do not schedule exams on Saturdays.

Gabay was challenged by Rivka Augenfeld who said she favours the Y opening on Shabbat and recalled that at one time that was case. She remembers well-attended Onegei Shabbat with cultural themes on Friday nights and recreational facilities being open on Saturday.

"Not everyone goes to shul, but many would like to do something Jewish [on Shabbat], not necessarily in a synagogue," she said.

Such a policy would be a "lot more honest," she maintained, given that the great majority of Montreal Jews do not follow Shabbat strictly.

"It's revisionist history to talk as if the Y never did it before."

Arrangements could be made to ensure that no staff members would have to work on Shabbat if it was against their principles, she added.

Augenfeld disputed the often repeated argument that Montreal is a very traditional Jewish community and therefore should not follow the trend among North American Jewish community centres to Shabbat openings.

"Way, way back, a lot more happened in this community on Shabbat than it does now."

She rejected the argument that having the Y open on Shabbat is in any way connected to the legitimate concerns of observant Jewish students having to write compulsory exams.

CJC Quebec region executive director David Birnbaum, who identified himself as "a proud secular Jew," said he not only does not feel deprived by not being able to work out Shabbat but would be "offended" if the the Y opened that day.

"Not opening on Shabbat is not disrespectful to the secular… We can't have it both ways."

Another executive member, Bernard Tonchin, noted that at a religious camp he is associated with, recreational activities like swimming and baseball, are permitted because the camp is within an eruv.

He is in favour of the Y being open on Shabbat because it will "keep kids off the street and out of trouble. We have to be realistic…

"We are in the 21st century. We can't force the Orthodox tradition on the majority of people."

However, Roslyn Schneidman was adamantly opposed to any Shabbat opening.

"We are a unique community. Seventy-five to 80 per cent are not shomer Shabbat; still, they are members of Orthodox synagogues and want to feel close to Judaism, and there is only one type of Judaism. Just as we insist that kashrut must be respected at all community events, we should respect the minority of Jews [who are shomer Shabbat]."

Moreover, Schneidman said, "forcing people to work on Shabbat would be totally against everything we believe in."

Inuit visitors to Israel feel a special bond

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In Resolute Bay and in other communities across the vast expanse of Nunavut, people are learning more and more about the State of Israel. Susan Salluviniq is seeing to that.

Every time Salluviniq and other Inuit visitors to the Jewish state return home, they are peppered with questions by their friends and neighbours who want to know what it was like to visit the Bible's holy sites.

Salluviniq has taken to making and distributing copies of videotapes shot during her visits to Israel. She has also appeared on territory-wide TV to display the images and tell about her experiences there.

Ariel Mayor Ronald Nachman with Inuit drum, October 2000

Salluviniq will be making her fourth trip to Israel this week, along with about 16 other Inuit from Canada's most northern region. Although she hails from Resolute Bay – a hamlet that bills itself as the jumping off place for North Pole expeditions – she won't be the northernmost visitor to Israel. One of her travelling companions hails from Grise Fiord, a community at the southern tip of Ellesmere Island that is even closer to the North Pole. Others hail from Rankin Inlet, the Nunavut community that was made famous thanks to the hockey exploits of its favourite son, national junior team member Jordin Tootoo.

Among Nunavut's Inuit community, interest in Israel is growing, Salluviniq said. After her appearances on regional TV, "people tell us they have always longed to go to Israel. More and more want to go." But for most, the cost and the distance make the trip prohibitive.

This time, Salluviniq will be travelling with her husband Allie (it will be his third visit) and their 16-year-old daughter Gloria, who will be goin on her first visit.

Flying from Toronto to Tel Aviv is the easy part of their journey. Getting to the El Al check-in counter at Pearson Airport is the hard part – and, she says, even more costly than the flight to Israel. From Resolute Bay, the family will travel to Nanisivik, Iqaluit and from there to Ottawa, about six hours in all. Next stop is Toronto and from there, it's 12 more hours to Israel.

But Salluviniq is excited at the prospect of seeing the Sea of Galilee, Jerusalem and visiting with Jews in Israel and Samaria. She believes there is a special bond between Inuit and Jews. Growing up in a devout Christian household, Salluviniq was taught the Bible and developed a deep appreciation for the Jewish people.

"I pray for Israel, because of the Jewish people," she said. "We are very grateful to the Jewish people because the word of God was given to the Jewish people and through them it reached the Inuit in the far north. We'd like to help them as much as we can."

That's a view echoed by Tagak Curley, one of Nunavut's most prominent citizens. A resident of Rankin Inlet, Curley is known as one of Nunavut's founding fathers. He served as a member of the legislative assembly of the Northwest Territories from 1979 to 1987, holding several cabinet posts. Nunavut was created as a separate territory in 1999.

Curley perceives "a strong relationship" between Inuit and Jews. "We're so few people, so are they. They've had to endure and struggle. So did we up here.

"We want to be a blessing to the Jewish people. That country hurts every day. We hope we can be a blessing to them, and they to us."

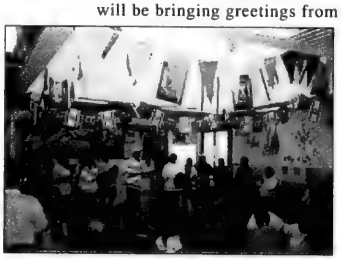
Like Salluviniq, Curley is a student of the Bible. As someone intensely interested in politics – "I was born a political person," he said – he particularly enjoys reading about King David. The visit will give him the opportunity to inquire about Israel's current political situation, as well as to visit historically-significant sites.

"Those of us who believe in God have some connection to Israel," he said. "I really believe that every believer in God should have the opportunity to go."

Inuit take part in Jerusalem march in October 2000

Curley and Sulluviniq will be travelling as part of a group of 26, said Roger Armbruster, a clergyman from Niverville, Man. who is co-ordinating the trip.

Among the participants will be Rebecca Williams, a member of the Nunavut legislature who will be bringing greetings from Nunavut Premier Paul Okalik. Armbruster said the group is scheduled to meet with an advisor to Israeli President Moshe Katsav, who another group met in person during an earlier visit.



Inuit performing for Israeli school chidlren in Beth Shemesh, January 2002

This will be the fourth Inuit group to visit Israel since 1998, Armbruster said. Although the numbers are modest – the largest consisted of 32 visitors – for the participants, the trips are significant.

"The [Inuit] see themselves as exiles, much like the Jewish people, and they had to fight for their territory… They just know in their souls they've both experienced pain and have been oppressed by more dominant cultures. It just gives them a sense of connection."

On the gift of friendship

By IAN LEVENTHAL

It was during the Tang Dynasty in the eighth century that groups of Jews came to China via the Silk Road. The earliest Jewish settlement of any significance was in Kaifeng. It wasn't until much later, in the 19th century, that other Jewish communities developed in Harbin, Tianjin and Shanghai.

These cities were home to Sephardi traders, Russian Jews fleeing pogroms and, ultimately, Austrian Jews one step ahead of the Nazi onslaught. Twenty thousand Jews fleeing the horrors of the Holocaust found refuge in Shanghai. China provided a safe haven for Jews at a time when most other countries denied them entrance, and ultimately denied them survival.

Encouraged to explore the Chinese-Jewish connection by my well-travelled friend Harriet Morton, my wife Renee and I embarked on a journey that would change our lives. In the spring of 2001, we made a brief but profound visit to Shanghai, a teeming metropolis with 16 million inhabitants.

A stop at the Ohel Moshe Synagogue in the Hongkou district of the city put us at the epicentre of a long-forgotten Jewish community that since 1941 had all but evaporated. Built in 1927 by Russian Jews, the synagogue was in need of repairs. Its exhibits highlighting the stories of European Jewish refugees were filled with emotion, but seemed inadequate and forlorn.

When I returned to Canada, this little-known piece of Jewish history became my obsession. I believed the tales of hardship, sacrifice, sanctuary and survival must be retold to a new generation. With Harriet as my co-chair and with the assistance of designer Tom Rado, an exhibit on the Jewish experience in China during the Holocaust, called The Gift of Friendship, was born.

In the course of our research, Harriet, a past president of ORT, and I discovered that there was an ORT presence in Shanghai. In the tumultuous years leading up to the Holocaust, ORT workshops and schools trained and assisted Jewish refugees in their adopted city. ORT vocational training provided families with life-saving trades and social skills that would enable them to survive the war years.

A view of the Ohel Moshe Synagogue courtyard as seen from the art exhibition hall.

We approached ORT Toronto to sponsor the exhibit and they agreed. Executive director Joel Shapiro was able to find a fascinating archive of priceless photos of this era through World ORT. These photos would be incorporated into the exhibit as a visual reminder of the times. We were on our way.

The exhibit would consist of a collection of original art created by local Jewish and Chinese Canadian artists demonstrating the compassion shown to the European Jews who found sanctuary in World War II Shanghai. Artists were eager to join in and the pieces were created and readied for the exhibition's opening on May 23, 2002, at the Chinese Cultural Centre of Greater Toronto.

Exhibit installed on shul grounds

With the support of the government of The People's Republic of China and Canadian Gov.-Gen. Adrienne Clarkson as our honorary patron, we were poised to make history. In the presence of Ontario Lt.-Gov. James Bartleman, Senator Vivian Poy, reprentatives from the Israeli and local governments, co-presidents of ORT Toronto, Renee Bleeman-Beranbaum and Peter Kellner, the exhibit opened to an overflow crowd of 700. Well over 5,000 people visited the exhibit during its stay in Toronto. Two weeks later, after its close on June 14, it was dismantled and repacked for shipment to China.

On Oct. 23, 2002, The Gift of Friendship was permanently installed in a newly refurbished building on the grounds of Ohel Moshe Synagogue, with the sculptures, paintings and photographs described in both English and Chinese. Viewers were dazzled by the works of artists such as Anne Harris, Al Green, Pedie Wolfond, Tootsie Halbert, Ron So, Alfred Ng, Charles Pachter and Gina Godfrey, among others.

The neo-classic facade of Shanghai's Ohel Rachel Synagogue, built in 1920 by the Sasson family.

After a speech by Canada's consul general in Shanghai, Stewart Beck, and an address by the deputy magistrate of Hongkou, Madame Yao, Harriet and I read greetings from Toronto's Jewish community, and officially presented the exhibit to the people of Shanghai. The hall was now open.

Shalom Greenberg, the city's only rabbi, then affixed a glittering mezuzah on the sanctuary doorpost. The blessing was recited and for the first time in over 50 years, the Shehechiyanu was heard. The freshly whitewashed synagogue burst with life and purpose, beautiful in its resolve to give meaning to a community reborn.

The Gift of Friendship has already made a difference in relations between the Chinese and Jewish communities. There are plans by the Hongkou district government and a consortium of Jewish-Canadian businesspeople for the restoration and rebuilding of the former Jewish area surrounding the synagogue.

A great master was once asked to describe the most important quality needed for enlightenment. He answered with one word: generosity. In the philosophies of the Far East, this generosity is called dana, meaning selfless giving. In Judaism, we call it tzedakah. The Toronto community, together with our Chinese friends, have rekindled the light of hope and understanding through their generous spirit. I encourage Jewish travellers to visit Shanghai and experience firsthand the ancient bonds that unite our two nations.

Canadian at Oxford inspired by Limmud conference

By ALIZA CRAIMER
Special to The CJN

What did you do on your winter holiday? If you are like 2,100 Jews in the United Kingdom, you descended upon the University of Nottingham for the annual winter conference of the Jewish educational organization, Limmud.

For five days, you go from session to session feasting on a veritable buffet of Jewish education. If you are so inclined (and I was), you can attend sessions from early morning until late at night at programs on community, culture, education, family, history, Israel, music, philosophy, social issues, Torah and more.

Between sessions, and while scarfing down the not-so-gourmet meals, people from all over England, continental Europe, Israel, North America and South America have the opportunity to chat and get to know one another.

Since the conference began more than 20 years ago with 80 participants, Limmud has grown immensely. This year's event featured 350 speakers and almost 700 sessions. There is something incredibly inspiring about taking an intensive period of time and devoting it to Jewish learning, especially during such a hyper-commercialized Christian holiday season.

As one person explained it, the goal of Limmud is to take each person further on his or her personal Jewish journey. This intent was evident in the variety of sessions and denominations represented at the conference. Whatever their personal background or level of religious observance, participants shared a strong sense of Jewish identity and a desire to expand their Jewish literacy.

For me, the sessions were the highlight of the conference. Of the 15-plus sessions I attended, none felt like a waste of time. That said, some of them stood out.

One of the best speakers was Canadian MP and human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler, who spoke compellingly about the "new anti-Jewishness" and indicators of this trend, including state-sanctioned cultures of hate (in most Arab countries and the Palestinian Authority) and genocidal covenants against Israel and the Jews (Hamas and Hezbollah).

Daniel Taub, a lawyer in Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, gave a fascinating lecture about negotiation theory, based on his experiences as a negotiator in the Israeli-Palestinian and Israel-Syria negotiations. I had never really considered the complexities of negotiations, and it was enlightening to hear about the dynamics and psychology involved from someone with firsthand experience.

In order to broaden my horizons away from my main passion, Israel, I attended a variety of sessions on other topics, including the issue of Judaism as universalistic or particularistic, Halachah and alternative medicine, and how to lead the Kabbalat Shabbat service. The latter session was especially useful and gave me a feeling of really connecting with being Jewish.

I am glad that Limmud has a "how-to" series of lectures that provide useful information for everyday Jewish living. Even though I will probably never lead a Shabbat service, I take pride in the fact that I am on my way to having this ability. Another bonus of this session was that I had the chance to ask general questions about praying protocol, long forgotten from my Akiva Academy days.

For instance, it was really bothering me that at the end of the Amidah service I could not remember which way to bow first. Now, I no longer have to rely on furtive glances at my neighbours (hoping that they too are not guessing). Bowing first to the left at the end of the Amidah may seem like a trivial detail; however, now that this technical mystery is solved, I can focus more on the praying and less on the esthetics.

Some may be thinking that attending so many lectures would be exhausting. But Café Limmud and the bar were great for re-energizing and socializing, and the participants in open-mike sessions at the Limmud acoustic café consistently wowed me with their talent. In the evenings, you could also do Israeli dancing or attend a Jewish stand-up comedy show. And the Brighton Jewish film festival selections were a great way to relax at the end of a long day of lectures. Whatever your interests, there was no shortage of ways to unwind!

As I relished my experience at the conference, I could not help but think about my fellow Canadians and how much the Jewish community at home could benefit from such a winter conference. I spoke with some ex-pat British Limmudniks who are working on a Canadian Limmud for spring 2004 in the Toronto area. I won't be home until fall 2004, but if Limmud is not yet established, I intend to organize one. With a lot of help (anyone interested?), hopefully, we'll see Limmud Banff in 2005! For more information on Limmud, check out www.limmud.org.

Sharon slams Arafat after violence-filled weekend

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon lashed out at Yasser Arafat this week after the Palestinian Authority president called for a halt to terror attacks until after the Israeli election.

The latest salvo in the war of words came as the ongoing violence on the ground continued to claim both Israeli and Palestinian lives.

On Monday, two Palestinian teens were shot dead by Israeli troops in Gaza as they approached a bus travelling in a convoy from Israel to the Israeli community of Netzarim in central Gaza.

The pair, aged 14 and 17, came under fire as they approached the bus minutes after what was thought to be an anti-tank missile was fired at it and missed. Troops found a Kalashnikov rifle and several grenades next to their bodies.

In northern Israel on Sunday, two Palestinian terrorists killed one Israeli and seriously wounded another after they infiltrated a farming community.

Israeli forces arrived at Moshav Gadish shortly after the shooting to carry out extensive searches of the area. They later killed the two infiltrators.

At least two border police officers who responded to the attack were wounded, one of them moderately, in a clash with the infiltrators.

Moshav Gadish is located near an area where the local regional council recently began building a fence to prevent terrorist infiltrations from the West Bank.

In another development Sunday, an Israeli was killed by terrorists who crossed the Israel-Egypt border, Ha'aretz reported.

Two of the terrorists were later killed by Israeli troops. It was unclear if the two were Egyptian or Palestinian. Security forces searched for a third man who fled the scene.

And after another deadly incident Sunday, Israeli and Palestinian officials disagreed about who was killed after an Israeli helicopter fired missiles at a car in Gaza.

Israel said two members of Hamas were killed, a claim confirmed by a Hezbollah TV station in Lebanon.

But Palestinian hospital officials said the two victims were a 14-year-old and a 19-year-old who were not members of any terrorist group.

In another disputed incident, a Palestinian was killed when gunmen opened fire on an Israeli truck near Hebron. Security guards escorting the truck returned fire, killing the Palestinian.

The army said the Palestinian was a Hamas member, but Palestinian sources said he was an innocent bystander.

Earlier Sunday, two Israelis were lightly wounded when Palestinians fired three rockets from northern Gaza toward the Negev town of Sderot.

Hamas claimed responsibility for the strike, saying it came in retaliation for Israeli military incursions Saturday night in Khan Yunis and Beit Hanoun.

During those Gaza operations, Palestinian sources said, two people were killed and some 20 others injured during exchanges of fire with soldiers.

In Khan Yunis, Israeli troops destroyed metal workshops that the army said were used to make weapons.

In Beit Hanoun, troops demolished the home of a Palestinian who carried out a suicide attack three months ago against an Israeli naval boat off the Gaza coast. Three crew members were wounded in that incident.

Meanwhile, as the dizzying violence continued, Sharon on Sunday rejected a Palestinian cabinet statement issued the day before by Arafat calling for a halt to Palestinian terror attacks until after the Israeli elections.

As the Jan. 28 vote "date gets closer, we appeal to all our people to practise self-restraint," the statement said.

Speaking at his weekly cabinet meeting Sunday, Sharon said the statement proves "what Israel has maintained for the past two years – that Yasser Arafat has established, is responsible for and leads a coalition of terror, which he can leash or unleash and use as he pleases."

Sharon also said the Arafat statement proves that the murder of Israelis is a "constant and permanent goal" of the Palestinian leader.

"Before the elections, it is OK to commit murder," Sharon said. "Close to the election date, it's better not to. After the elections, it's OK to continue. Here, we clearly see Yasser Arafat's true face, which is so well known to us."

Sharon added: "One cannot negotiate with such a man" since "any attempt to do so will only harm our ability to achieve security and peace in this land. All those who aspire to peace between peoples must understand that Yasser Arafat is an obstacle to peace who must leave the political stage."

Also Sunday, Sharon told the British ambassador to Israel that the government does not intend to reverse its decision to bar a Palestinian delegation from attending a conference on reform of the Palestinian Authority that was originally scheduled to be held in London this week.

The cabinet issued the travel ban as part of its response to the recent terror attack in Tel Aviv that killed 22 people and wounded more than 100.

Sharon told the ambassador that Israel considers British Prime Minister Tony Blair a friend of Israel, but the Palestinians must implement reform in the West Bank and Gaza, not in London.

In another development, Palestinian official Saeb Erekat accused Sharon of stepping up military actions in the West Bank and Gaza to divert attention from corruption allegations that have eroded support for his Likud Party in the upcoming election.

Weekend public opinion polls forecast Sharon's Likud party winning as few as 27 Knesset seats, down from initial forecasts of 40. The polls reflected Israeli reaction to allegations of vote-buying in the Likud's recent primary, and to the disclosure of an investigation into a $1.5 million (US) loan Sharon's son took from a family friend in South Africa to pay back illegal campaign contributions to his father in 1999.

At a news conference broadcast last week, Sharon said the allegations surrounding the loan were an "old issue" that "has nothing to do with me."

The chairman of the Central Election Committee, Justice Mishael Cheshin, ordered broadcasting outlets to take the news conference off the air while Sharon was speaking. Cheshin said Sharon was violating elections law because his remarks constituted election propaganda – a charge Sharon denied.

CIC brings Canadians to Israel

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) is currently running two major trips to the Jewish state. The first, which began Jan. 12, brought a group of 20 leading grassroots activists from across Canada to participate in the first Local Israel Action Team (LIAT) leadership mission to Israel. The week-long training program will feature top Israeli strategists and hasbarah (PR) experts and will train participants in the skills and information they need to increase the advocacy efforts of Canada's pro-Israel community. The program will also include a session with Canadian and Israeli journalists, including Canadians Neil MacDonald and Paul Adams, who will speak on the challenges of covering Israel in the media.

The CIC's second trip, which takes place from Jan. 14 to Jan. 23, is its second parliamentary trip to Israel in in six months.

The delegation of more than 20 people, which includes Art Eggleton, Stockwell Day and newly appointed Senator David Smith, is spending a week in Israel receiving briefings from leading political figures, academics, government officials and journalists. The trip's participants will visit the Golan Heights and will receive several military and intelligence briefings.

The CJN will be covering both missions. Daily entries will appear on the CJN's Web site.

Researchers hail dramatic First Temple period finding

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An inscription attributed to Jehoash, the king of Judea who ruled in Jerusalem at the end of the ninth century BCE, has been authenticated by experts from the National Infrastructure Ministry's Geological Survey of Israel following months of examination.

The 10-line fragment, which was reportedly found on the Temple Mount, is written in the first person, on a black stone tablet, in ancient Phoenician script. The inscription's description of Temple "house repairs" ordered by King Jehoash strongly resembles passages in the Second Book of Kings, Chapter 12.

Dr. Gabriel Barkai, a leading Israeli archeologist from Bar-Ilan University's Land of Israel studies department, says if the inscription proves to be authentic, the finding is a "sensation" of the greatest import. It could be, he says, the most significant archeological finding yet in Jerusalem and the Land of Israel, because it would be a first-of-its kind piece of physical evidence describing events in a manner that adheres to the narrative in the Bible.

Such a finding, which appears to furnish proof that the Temple existed, must be made available for examination by scholars, and can not be kept a virtual secret, Barkai says.

Detailed research findings pertaining to the inscription will be presented in a collection of articles published by the Geology Survey of Israel, a government research institute. Research studies have been prepared by Dr. Shimon Ilani, Dr. Amnon Rosenfeld and Michael Dvorchik, the institute's chief technician, who carried out electronic microscope tests of the inscription that, the three say, were largely responsible for authenticating the finding.

Apart from noting that the discovery was made in Jerusalem, the researchers do not disclose where the inscription was found. But sources have indicated that the writing surfaced in the Temple Mount area as a result of widescale excavation work done in the area by Muslims in recent years, and that Palestinians sent the fragment to a major collector of antiquities in Jerusalem.

The Jerusalem collector is represented by attorney Isaac Herzog, a former cabinet secretary and currently a Knesset candidate on the Labor party list.

The collector offered to sell the inscription to the Israel Museum, but museum curators who examined the fragment expressed doubt about its authenticity, though they did not state categorically that the writing was a forgery.

Ilani and Rosenfeld declined to discuss the Israel Museum's response. But officials from the Geology Survey said results of the battery of examinations carried out must be taken as conclusive. It is inconceivable that such extensive testing would fail to reveal a forgery, they said. The inscription is authentic, they insisted, and the finding is an archeological sensation that could have global repercussions and that effectively vindicates Jewish claims to the Temple Mount.

Using terms reminiscent of the description in the Second Book of Kings, the inscription lauds repairs carried out by King Jehoash. It includes the king's request that priests collect public money to be used for the repair of the First Temple, and there are references to the purchase of timber and quarried stones to be used for the repairs.

The inscription contains fragments from 2 Kings 12:15: "And they did not ask an accounting from the men into whose hands they delivered the money to pay out to the workmen; for they dealt honestly."

The researchers believe that the sandstone used for the inscription was brought from southern Jordan or the Dead Sea region. Materials that covered the inscription over the years date from 200 to 400 BCE, they suggest.

Ilani and Rosenfeld speculate that during this period, the inscription began to be covered up as a buried object. Should this hypothesis be correct, it would mean that the inscription was exposed to the elements for hundreds of years, before being buried some 500 to 600 years after it was written.

Barkai told Ha'aretz that "the problem here is that circumstances of the finding are not clear... We should wait for the official scientific publication, at which time we will be able to probe this finding carefully. Right now, of course, we can't rule out any possibility. It's too bad that a matter of this sort was kept under wraps, apparently due to business concerns."

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2003 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 21, 2003. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 28, 2003.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 13, 2003. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec

Immigration of Falashmura resumes

By YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The immigration of Falashmura to Israel from Ethiopia was to resume this week through a third country, Avigdor Yitzhaki, the director-general of the Prime Minister's Office, told representatives of the community Sunday, saying he had reached an agreement on the issue with the Jewish Agency, which is responsible for bringing Falashmura to Israel.

Direct flights between Ethiopia and Israel were suspended a 1½ months ago after the Civil Aviation Administration ordered an Ethiopian Airlines flight to land at Ovda Airport in the Negev because of concerns about security arrangements at Addis Ababa Airport.

Before Yitzhaki's meeting with the Falashmura, several thousand members of the community demonstrated outside the Prime Minister's Office, demanding the government accelerate the immigration of the remaining Falashmura left in Ethiopia. The called for the annulment of Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein's decision in February 2001 that converts are not entitled to bring their relatives to Israel under the Law of Return, as are other Jews.

Meanwhile, the cabinet on Sunday did not discuss Interior Minister Eli Yishai's plan to bring the 17,000 Falashmura remaining in Ethiopia to Israel immediately, despite Yishai's request to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week for an urgent debate on the plan. Yishai will try to raise the issue at next week's cabinet meeting.

Since 1998, when 4,000 Falashmura were brought to Israel, members of the community have been arriving in Israel under the Law of Return. Yishai now wishes to bring the entire community to Israel in accordance with Rabbi Ovadia Yossef's recent ruling that the Falashmura are connected to Judaism through maternal lineage, and have started to return to practising Judaism.

The NPT allows a state to withdraw from the treaty by announcing its intention three months in advance and reporting to the Security Council and members of the organization.

But North Korea announced that its withdrawal from the treaty is "automatic and effective immediately" in reaction to threats from America and its "servant," the IAEA.

Washington's efforts to restrict North Korea's activities have failed. A CIA report published last week, after being presented to the U.S. Congress, says North Korean violations in nuclear weapons matters were already being monitored at the end of 2001. According to one American estimate, North Korea already has enough fissile material to manufacture one nuclear bomb and perhaps two.

North Korea's statement describes its withdrawal from the NPT as self-defence to preserve its sovereignty and dignity, following an American ultimatum. The country first threatened to withdraw from the NPT in 1993.

Ilan Ramon, a Sabra in space

learn the skills he would need for the mission, which include supervision and operation of a multispectral camera for recording desert aerosol.

While aboard the shuttle, Ramon's main responsibility will be supervising the Mediterranean Israeli Dust Experiment (MEIDEX), which was conceived and created by Tel Aviv University. MEIDEX is comprised of four experiments that will involve the participation of five of the seven astronauts on the mission, as well as a crew taking measurements simultaneously in a technologically retro-fitted plane flown in the wake of the orbiter while it flies over the Mediterranean.

In an interview, Ramon said he understands the harsh realities involved in space travel. It will be a tough expedition filled with hard work and a lot of responsibility. The shuttle, despite its $2 billion (US) price tag, offers few luxuries in orbit for the seven astronauts. They will be jammed in tight quarters for over two weeks, working 16 hours a day (or night) in a shuttle that will be orbiting 150 miles above earth and circumnavigating the globe every 90 minutes at a speed of more than 18,125 miles per hour.

But Ramon does not fear the prospect of an accident in space.

"I have been in the business of flying for over 30 years," he said in his native Hebrew. "During my time in the Israeli Air Force, I lost many friends, most of them in accidents. The prospect of an accident in space is small."

But while sitting over a cup of coffee at the space centre, where Ramon has been training for the last 4½ years, he said, "In the first eight minutes after the launch, we will be sitting on a four million litre barrel of explosive fuel. We are talking about a consumption rate of 4,000 liters per second."

Ramon was wearing a green shirt emblazoned with the NASA logo and that of his mission, STS-107, and a pin with an illustration of the Columbia and the names of the crew.

As a child, Ramon said he wanted to be a pilot, not an astronaut. After graduating from high school in 1972, he enlisted in the Israel Air Force (IAF) and graduated in 1974 from flight school as a fighter pilot.

In 1980, as a member of the IAF's first F-16 squadron in Israel, he attended the F-16 training course at Hill Air Force Base in Utah. Ramon took a four-year sabbatical during the mid-1980s to study at Tel Aviv University before returning to his military career. From 1988 to 1990, he served as a deputy squadron commander, and from 1990 to 1992, as an F-16 squadron commander.

Ramon, who is widely rumoured to have flown in the 1981 attack on Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor, neither confirmed nor denied his presumed participation. "Maybe I was there," he said with a smile, "maybe not."

In 1994, Ramon was promoted to the rank of colonel and assigned as head of the army's department of operational requirement for weapon development and acquisition. He stayed at this post until he received a telephone call from the air force commander – an offer for him to pack and move to Houston, a chance to be an astronaut.

"I have to consult my wife," Ramon replied.

But his commander knew that after over 3,000 flight hours on the A-4, Mirage III-C and F-4, and over 1,000 flight hours on the F-16, Ramon was ready for a new mission.

"After 30 years of flying, and surviving two accidents, the fear is behind me," Ramon said.

His wife, Rona, and four children, Asaf, 14, Tal, 12, Iftach, 9, and Noa, 5, will be watching the launch, as will many of his family and friends. Ramon refused to name names, but joked, "It's like making a list of guests for your wedding. Lately, it seems that making the list takes more time than preparing for the mission."

But not everyone Ramon invited will be able to attend.

"Ezer Weizman wrote me back that he is envious of me, but he is unable to come because of health problems. I wish Ezer would come, not as a former president, but as one of the founders of the Israeli Air Force."

Ramon added that, "More then anyone, I'll miss my Mom, Tonia. She is a survivor of Auschwitz, and suffering from Alzheimer's at an advanced stage."

Even though Weizman will not be at the launch, he and all of Israel will be with Ramon in spirit.

"Each astronaut is able to take 10 items on board. I'll take the banner of the President of Israel and the logo of Tel Aviv University," Ramon said.

Among other items, Ramon is taking aboard a painting from the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial. The painting, a depiction of the earth from a perspective on the moon, was created by 14-year-old Holocaust victim Peter Gintz. Along with other young prisoners in the Theresienstadt concentration camp, Gintz published a secret bulletin in order to keep spirits up. He was eventually murdered at Auschwitz.

As for his personal items, Ramon is bringing a brooch for his wife and watches for his father and kids, a special mezuzah belonging to the Organization of Holocaust survivors in Los Angeles and a small Bible.

Ramon was reluctant to discuss the Bible because he will do so in a live broadcast from orbit.

Despite the fact that he is not a religious man and does not keep kosher, he believes he has a responsibility to the Jewish people.

"I left Israel as a 'shaliach,' a representative of Israel and the Air Force. After more than four years of training in the United States and dozens of meetings in Jewish communities, I feel that I am now representing the Jewish people," said Ramon, who also speaks fluent English.

"I asked NASA to look for kosher food and they found a producer of kosher food in bags that keeps the correct temperature for preservation in space. I am not going to eat pork or seafood, despite the fact that shrimp cocktail is the most popular food in space."

As for Shabbat, Ramon has rabbinic permission to continue work on Shabbat during the mission.

Soprano, 22, thrilled to be singing Glick's music

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Lyric soprano and dancer Leah Moss, 22, is donating her time and talents to support victims of terror in Israel in a concert to raise funds for the Adopt-A-Family project.

A native Torontonian now studying at the Julliard School of Music in New York, Moss will perform at the concert, titled Lighting Darkness Music from the Soul, on Sunday, Jan. 19, at 8 p.m. at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave.

In addition, the evening will feature the Amati String Quartet, who are also donating their time, and some of Moss's Julliard professors – Kendall Briggs, who will play the piano, and Greg Knowles, who will record Moss's first CD.

In an interview in Toronto while visiting family, Moss said she is thrilled that her teachers have volunteered to be in Toronto to assist with this concert.

Above all, she says, as a member of Beth Tikvah, she has come full circle, because she will be singing some of the late Srul Irving Glick's music.

"He was my inspiration. When I was in the Toronto Children's Chorus, Srul came to lead us in his composition, Candle Lullaby from his Chanukah Medley, which I immediately fell in love with. For the next 10 years, whenever I was at Beth Tikvah, Srul made a point of speaking to me and encouraging me. And now, as a tribute, I will be performing several of his wonderful songs at the concert."

Moss began her musical career at a difficult time in her life. When she was nine years old, her father Malcolm Moss, a film producer, died. The same year, her teacher at Bayview Elementary and Middle School, Phil Penny, who recognized her talent, approached her and suggested that she audition for the Toronto Children's Chorus.

Although she had loved to sing since she was a child, Moss had never taken any formal music training. But she accepted the challenge and when she arrived for the audition, she was stunned to see others arriving with their music and pianists and a history of formal musical training.

Nevertheless, shaking in her shoes, she explained her lack of experience. She was asked to sing O Canada and several other melodies, given a few tone tests and was shocked several months later to receive a letter inviting her to join the Children's Chorus.

She says that from that day on, music became her passion and she realized that she wanted to sing professionally.

"I love every form of music. In London, England, my late grandfather taught ballroom dancing and my late grandmother was in a dance musical theatre. I guess it is in the genes."

She graduated from Claude Watson School for the Performing Arts and performed in numerous musical theatre programs, including some at Interlochen Arts Camp in Michigan and the American Academy of Dramatic Arts. She has also done opera interpretations with maestro Vincent LaSelva in New York, and last summer, she completed a juried opera program in Siena, Italy.

Moss says that in music, "I want to do it all."

In her formal training, she has concentrated on opera, "which will enable me to do many different forms of music. Today, they are experimenting with all types of music. Opera is becoming more mainstream and at times, melding with Broadway. And now, more and more parents are taking their children to hear opera."

At her grandfather's funeral in Greensboro, N.C., a few years ago, Moss sang a beautiful tribute in his memory. Last year, the rabbi there spoke to her about returning to perform in a concert. She told him how disturbed she was by the bombings in Israel and offered to donate her talents to raise funds to help.

On Nov. 17, 2002, Moss presented her first fund-raising concert in Greensboro, which opened the door to other American performances and the concert at Beth Tikvah.

For her concerts in aid of Israeli terrorist victims, Moss presents traditional Hebrew, Ladino and Jewish folk tunes, as well as selections from Mendelssohn, Shemer, Goldfalden, Ravel and others.

But it is Srul Glick's Candle Lullaby and his Seven Tableaux that give her the most joy.

Moss has been invited to perform in Salt Lake City, Utah, in May, at a benefit concert for the Hadassah WIZO organization.

Singer Leah Moss will present a concert at Beth Tikvah Synagogue to assist Israeli victims of terrorist acts.

"The anguish about the ongoing acts of violence in Israel against innocent men, women and children led me to ask, 'What can I do to help?'

"I feel music is the universal language and has always been a large part of Jewish tradition and culture. This is a unique opportunity for me to use this language to help Jews through a difficult period in our history, as music has helped us time and time again."

Tickets for the concert at Beth Tikvah are $10. A reception will follow. For tickets or information, call 416-221-3433, extension 358.

An Illustrator's Secrets: Israeli illustrator Avi Katz, whose work regularly graces the pages of the biweekly Jerusalem Report, divulges some of his professional secrets in the latest issue of Ariel, the Israeli arts and letters magazine.

Each issue of the Jerusalem Report contains at least a dozen of his paintings, Katz says, and four or five of those assignments inevitably reach him on deadline day. "The pictorial frenzy requires fast thinking and execution, but it would be entirely impossible if not for the use of modern digital technology," he writes.

Ari Katz's Billiard Co-existence

A typical Katz illustration begins as a pencil or pen-and-ink drawing on paper, which he then scans into the computer. Then he refines it and adds colour and effects with the aid of two graphics programmes, Photoshop and Painter. He uses a pen-shaped device called the Wacom stylus, which replaces the mouse and enables him to paint and draw directly on the computer.

Katz describes the Internet as "an endless repository of photographs and paintings of all kinds and subjects to be used and abused at will." He also credits modern computer technology and the Internet for making it possible to transfer artwork electronically in a fraction of a second and to revise and resend items in case changes are required.

Ariel offers a four-page colour spread of Katz's innovative illustrations, including the piece he calls Billiard co-existence, which he created with the 3-D animation software Hash Animaster, and which appeared only weeks before outbreak of the latest Intifadah.

The same issue of Ariel also features an article and colour spread on Marc Chagall in Israel, as well as pieces on Hebrew poetry, photography, chamber music and much more. Published by Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the 40-year-old publication demonstrates that Israel is still a fount of free expression and creative energy, despite the terrorist siege. Lost Tapes Discovered: Studio tapes of a comedy routine that Phil Hartman recorded in 1977 were discovered recently and have been made into a CD entitled Flat TV.

The tapes, which were never heard by the public before being lost, contain many spoofs on the world of television, including the late comedian's impersonations of Jimmy Carter, Henry Kissinger, Johnny Carson, Howard Cosell and others. Hartman is known for his roles on Saturday Night Live, The Simpsons and several movies. For details, visit www.laugh.com.

Crimes uncovers startling connections

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN

I'm somewhat taken aback by Adam Nashman's jaunty attitude toward the Holocaust. I come prepared to the Second Cup on Front Street, with serious questions for the boyish, curly-haired Jewish playwright and director. I expect melancholy. I expect gruesome. I expect horror. But he's cracking jokes and talking about the "entertainment value" of genocide.

Later, I realize the only way the Dora Award-winning playwright could have survived the two years it took for him to write and research a play about the Armenian genocide and the Jewish Holocaust was through humour – the same way, he tells me, that those who survived the atrocities must have gotten through.

"I know the survivors must have laughed somewhere along the way or else they wouldn't have survived," he says. "Maybe if there is one comment I dared to make it's to think about what those who survived were feeling."

But Nashman recalls much seriousness. When he accepted the commission to write the seven-actor, episodic play Crimes from Armenian director Hirant Alianak, he says he was ill prepared – as a writer, a Jew and the child of a Holocaust survivor – for the journey.

During the writing process, he retreated into isolation and made little time for social activities. His mood darkened and his mind filled with thoughts of orphaned four-year olds wandering the inner recesses of dark caves, as was the case in Armenia.

In 1915, under the rule of the "Young Turk" government of the Ottoman Empire, 1½ million Armenians were killed. The method of execution was a march into the desert, where many would starve and thirst to death in the burning sun. To this day, the Turkish government refuses to acknowledge the mass slaughter as anything other than a "relocation."

During his research, Nashman discovered startling connections between the Armenian genocide and the Holocaust. In the transcripts of the Nuremberg trials, Nashman read a comment by Adolf Hitler, who, when discussing how to dispose of the Jewish race, said, "Who remembers the Armenians?"

"The Turks were close allies with the Germans," Nashman says. "They [the Germans] were fostering the whole romantic ideal of the pure-blooded race and actually gave instructions to the Turks about going ahead and killing the Armenians."

After the killings, many orphans ended up in North America, angry, confused and haunted by images of dead and dying parents.

Crimes tells the story of the genocide from the point of view of two Armenian Canadians – a grandfather, who is a childhood survivor, and his grandson, both played by Alon Nashman (another Dora Award-winning actor, no relation).

The grandson, born also to a Jewish grandmother, lives in present day Toronto, oblivious – consciously, at least – to the horrors of genocide. He is hired as an anthropologist by a multi-national corporation to conduct research on mining land in Turkey, which takes him back to the site of the Armenian atrocities. Interwoven is the story of his grandfather, who came to Canada in 1917 as an Armenian orphan and went back to Germany in World War II to fight for the Americans.

"It's an action-adventure with touching bits and characters that fall in love," Nashman says. "It's not an in-depth emotional study. It's episodic and imagistic. Anytime you get too close, we end the scene."

The storyline journeys across continents and through time without focusing on either genocide, or race, very intensely or for very long.

"These were not separate genocides," Nashman says. "Yes, they were of different races, but both occurred during an intellectual movement to purify races. To actually put a spotlight on one of them is to really ignore the bigger issue, which is hate crimes."

Nashman says while researching and writing the play, he learned that misunderstanding and stubbornness are at the root of all genocide.

"The issue of genocide, particularly somebody else's, sheds a lot of light on the Jewish experience," he says. "The Holocaust wasn't an aberration – it happened to millions of people. It makes it feel less of a Jewish problem and more of a humanity problem."

Crimes previews from Jan. 16 and opens Tuesday, Jan. 20 and runs to Feb. 1 at the Berkeley Street Theatre upstairs, 26 Berkeley St. Performances are Tuesday to Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday at 2:30 p.m. For tickets, call 416-504-7529.

The 10 lost tribes of Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Throughout the centuries, Jews have been successively displaced by wars, conquests, religious passions and prejudices.

Two recently published books, the first about "crypto-Jews" and the second about one of the lost 10 tribes of Israel, address this recurring theme.

Waves of anti-Semitic persecution inundated Jewish communities in Spain after 1391. Reacting to the pressure, some Jews converted under duress, while others voluntarily became new Christians.

Among the converts were the so-called crypto-Jews, who publicly observed the rites and rituals of Roman Catholicism, but who secretly remained faithful to Jewish beliefs and traditions.

Fears about crypto-Jews in the ranks of the church led to the establishment of an Inquisition in Spain to rid the country of the Jewish "plague of heresy."

The infamous Inquisition, which spread to Portugal and Latin America, was intended to root out and punish Christians who secretly practised Judaism.

The horrors of the Inquisition did not deter dedicated crypto-Jews, whose continued existence and peculiar culture were an affront to the church.

But as a result of the Inquisition, many crypto-Jews fled to Spanish and Portuguese colonies in Latin America. In most cases, assimilation gradually eroded the Jewishness of their families.

Janet Liebman Jacobs, a professor of women's studies at the University of Colorado, has written an intriguing book about this generally obscure topic.

Hidden Heritage (University of California Press) is based on fieldwork with the descendants of crypto-Jews in California, Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, Texas and Kansas.

Jacobs also describes crypto-Jewish communities in Belmonte, Portugal, and on the Mediterranean island of Majorca.

She discovered that some of the descendants of crypto-Jews in the United States were none too pleased by their Jewish ancestry. Others accepted the fact with equanimity, while still others formally converted to Judaism.

In general, crytpo-Jews whose Jewish consciousness had not fallen away were deeply conflicted and lived in two worlds, in a "culture of silence."

Jacobs claims that the vast majority of Sabbath rituals among crypto-Jews were female-centred.

"My grandmother was a very Christian woman, but she lit candles on Friday night," a descendant of crypto-Jews told her. "Heaven only knows what prayers she was saying, because she would always say them sort of under her breath… There was a mystery and secrecy around this ritual."

As well as being faithful to Sabbath rituals, crypto-Jews adhered to certain dietary customs, rejecting "unclean" foods. They separated milk from meat, examined uncooked eggs for the presence of blood in the yolk and exhibited an aversion to pork, the mainstay of Latina cuisine.

In Hidden Heritage, Jacobs tells an engrossing story that speaks to tradition, family, memory, community and belonging. It is an extraordinary footnote in Jewish history.

The fate of Israel's Ten Lost Tribes has haunted historians and theologians. By all accounts, the tribes vanished after the northern kingdom of Israel was sacked by the Assyrians in the eighth century B.C.E.

Banished from their homes, they lost their Jewish identity after being completely assimilated into their host societies.

Hillel Halkin, an American writer living in Israel, claims to have discovered the descendants of the lost tribe of Menasseh. He stumbled upon them in a remote corner of India on the Burmese border.

In Across the Sabbath River (Houghton Mifflin), a fascinating but wordy account of his peregrinations through Asia, he travels to the Indian states of Mizoram and Manipur and comes upon a people, the Kuki-Chin-Mizo, who have, against all odds, retained their identity as Jews.

Halkin starts his journey as a skeptic, but ends up as a believer.

Read and decide for yourself.

KNOWN FOR GRITTY REALISM, N.Y. PHOTOGRAPHER WEEGEE SPOTLIGHTED AT ISRAEL MUSEUM

The Israel Museum in Jerusalem is paying tribute to Jewish-American photojournalist Arthur Fellig, who, from the '20s through the '40s, equipped himself with a police radio and patrolled the streets of New York in search of scenes of raw reality.

Arthur Fellig, also known as Weegee

Fellig shot for the New York Times and later for Acme Newspictures, an agency that supplied the other major New York dailies. He used the professional pseudonym of Weegee, the phonetic spelling of Ouija, and claimed he had psychic powers just like a Ouija board, allowing him to be the first person on the scene of news events.

His workplace was the streets of New York after dark, usually from 10 p.m. until daylight. He could often be found at a crime location before officers arrived. His legacy is tough, gritty photography, depicting the street life he loved to observe. His photography was acclaimed, not only for its subject matter, but also for the pioneering techniques that he developed.

The photographs on exhibit date from the period 1935 to 1945 and were selected from a German art dealer's collection. They depict both graphic crime scenes and the culture of New York's night people, to whom Weegee was attached throughout his life. He died in 1968.

For a sampling of Weegee's photos, visit the Web site www.icp.org/weegee/weegee.html. For more information on the Israel Museum, go to www.imj.org.il.

The exhibition continues until April 2003.

Abstract Expressionism in N.Y.: A survey exhibition of 31 works of the leading abstract expressionist Adolph Gottlieb (1903-1973) is currently on view at The Jewish Museum in Manhattan.

Along with Jackson Pollock, Willem de Kooning, Mark Rothko and Barnett Newman, Adolph Gottlieb reworked the premises of the European avant-garde into what has become known as a distinctly American achievement. Rothko and Gottlieb helped define the tenets of the new American abstract art in a 1943 letter to the New York Times in which they declared, "There is no such thing as good painting about nothing. We assert that the subject is crucial and only that subject matter is valid which is tragic and timeless."

The exhibition presents works from 1934 to 1973 and continues at the Museum (1109 Fifth Ave.) until March 2.

Info forums mark Alzheimer Awareness Month

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A degenerative brain disorder that destroys vital brain cells, Alzheimer's disease causes loss of memory, judgment and reasoning, and leads to difficulty in day-to-day functioning and changes in mood and behaviour.

According to statistics from the Alzheimer Society of Canada, more than 360,000 Canadians, including one in 20 over age 65, have the disease, and the number is expected to rise to more than 750,000 by 2031.

January is Alzheimer Awareness Month in Toronto and will be marked by a number of educational efforts, including public information forums on Jan. 21 from 6 to 8 p.m. at the North York Central Library, Brentwood Public Library and the offices of the Alzheimer Society of Toronto.

While some people develop the disease earlier, most cases appear after age 65. Current research suggests that genetics may play a part, although by no means a definitive one.

Women are twice as likely to feel the effects of Alzheimer's, because they live longer and because they tend to be the caregivers in their families.

There has also been some recent suggestion that women may be more susceptible to the disease, but researchers don't know why this may be so or even if it's true.

Extensive research into Alzheimer's is being carried out around the world. This includes developing more sensitive and specific testing procedures to permit earlier diagnosis, as well as drug therapies and hormone replacement therapy and the identification of vascular risk factors and such lifestyle factors as diet and wine and coffee consumption.

Preliminary research indicates that engaging in mentally stimulating activities and regular exercise appear to reduce the risk of developing Alzheimer's.

Although there is no cure, certain drugs, such as donepezil (known by the brand name Aricept), rivastigmine (Exelon) and galantamine (Reminyl), are used to treat early and middle-stage symptoms.

They stop the production of cholinesterase, an enzyme that breaks down acetylcholine, a chemical that relays messages between nerve cells in the brain. Most closely related to memory, learning and reasoning, acetylcholine is found in the part of the brain most often affected by Alzheimer's disease.

The drugs help slow down the loss of such cognitive abilities as memory, language and orientation, and help people stabilize their ability to cope with daily life.

These improvements are only temporary, however. They peak three months after the start of drug therapy, and treatments slowly lose their effectiveness after 9 to 12 months. But after that, a patient's decline is slower than among those people with Alzheimer's who have not received medication.

For that reason, there is considerable benefit to early diagnosis.

The Alzheimer Society urges people to immediately consult a doctor if they notice several of the following 10 warning signs in themselves or their loved ones:

- memory loss that affects day-to-day functioning;
- difficulty performing familiar tasks;
- problems with language;
- disorientation regarding time and place;
- poor or decreased judgment;
- difficulty with abstract thinking;
- misplacing things, including putting things in inappropriate places such as an iron in the freezer;
- changes in mood and behaviour for no apparent reason;
- changes in personality (Alzheimer's sufferers may change dramatically, becoming suspicious, withdrawn, or apathetic); and
- loss of initiative.

While many people show these symptoms from time to time, those with Alzheimer's exhibit them more frequently and more severely.

For more information about Alzheimer's or Alzheimer Awareness Month, call the Alzheimer Society of Toronto at 416-322-6560, or on the Web, visit www.alzheimertoronto.org or www.alzheimer.ca.

Tackling high-risk behaviours in teens

MONTREAL – Jewish Family Services (JFS) and the English Montreal School Board (EMSB) recently launched a pilot project aimed at lessening risk factors that may lead to problems such as drug abuse, violence, sexual promiscuity, self-destructive behaviours and gambling.

Six Montreal schools were selected. These schools receive a significant number of students from the feeder elementary schools.

JFS, the oldest social service agency in Quebec, is committed to enriching and improving the quality of school, work, family and community life of its clientele.

It has a team of professionals that provides students, parents, teachers and administrators with the tools they need to adapt to the ever-changing challenges of modern life.

Services include assessment, counselling, group programs, services for students with special needs, crisis intervention, speech and language services, occupational therapy services and parenting workshops.

JFS director of school services Barbara Victor and supervisor Cory Sirota-Frankel, working in conjunction with EMSB director of student services Lew Lewis and co-ordinator Dora Cesta, have proposed providing on-site support to the schools through the end of the current academic year.

Film on survivor love stories to be shown

HAMILTON — A feature documentary about couples whose love survived the separation and trauma of the Holocaust will be screened in Hamilton next month.

Scene from Undying Love.

Undying Love – written and directed by Helene Klodawsky, the daughter of Holocaust survivors, and produced by Ina Fichman – details love stories among Jewish death camp survivors immediately after World War II.

The Canadian film, which a Globe and Mail review said "offers a fresh take on what has become a well-travelled subject for documentarians," will be screened at 8 p.m. on Sunday Feb. 2, 2003 at McMaster University's Ewart Angus Building, Room 1A1.

Advance tickets are $18, $10 for students. Limited seating will be available at the door for $20.

Proceeds from the screening of the film, which has had sold-out showings in Toronto and New York and has appeared at the Montreal World Film Festival, are being donated to the Kehila Jewish Community Day School's Eitz Chaim Scholarship Fund. Undying Love will also be shown on CTV's W-Five on Feb 7 and Feb 9.

To reserve seats for the McMaster screening, contact Deborah Glogauer at 905-526-7538 or dglogauer@hotmail.com.

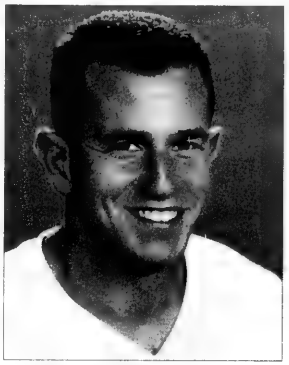
Fiedler fails to be first Jewish QB to win Super Bowl

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — This season seemed the perfect opportunity for Miami Dolphins' quarterback Jay Fiedler to finally become the first Jewish quarterback to win a Super Bowl.

Unlike past years, Fiedler was blessed with a talented core of defensive and offensive players. Running back Ricky Williams led the league in rushing, running with 1,853 yards. Defensive back Jason Taylor led the league in sacks. The teams' Super Bowl hopes were alive right through the final game of the season, which the Dolphins had to win to advance to the AFC playoffs.



Jay Fiedler

It was not to be. A heartbreaking 27-24 overtime loss to the New England Patriots – on Fiedler's 31st birthday no less – gave the Dolphins a 9-7 record and left them out of the playoffs.

"It is unthinkable that we did not even make the playoffs. We failed to achieve the first step needed to prove we are a good team," said Fiedler after the loss.

With less than five minutes remaining in the game, the Dolphins were up 24-13 and looked like a safe bet to beat the Pats. Instead, a series of costly errors, including Fiedler's inability to move the ball when it counted most, let last year's champs get past the Dolphins.

With time running down, Dolphins head coach Dave Wannstedt elected to have Fiedler throw the ball instead of handing off to Williams when a first down would have sealed the Dolphins' victory. Fiedler threw two incompletions, and on third down, his scramble fell short of the first-down marker. A short punt, followed by a Patriot touchdown, a two-point conversion and two field goals, ended the Dolphins' season.

History – and a Hollywood-like ending for the late-blooming QB – will again have to wait until next year. As recently as four years ago, it seemed Fiedler would not even start as a quarterback in the NFL.

Despite leading Dartmouth University to a 21-7 composite record from 1991-93 and setting school passing records in the process, Fiedler was far from a hot NFL prospect.

The NFL's top echelon decision-makers passed him by in the early rounds of the 1993 draft. People speculated that scouts thought the Ivy Leaguer with an engineering degree would have no place in the NFL. Or maybe, it was suggested, there was some latent anti-Semitism. But Fiedler refuses to use that as an excuse for not being drafted until the third round.

"You can't look at the situation and say that I wasn't picked because of discrimination or anything like that. People were not sure what to make of a quarterback who was not taken seriously because I did not play for a top college known for its football program," Fiedler said.

For the next three years, Fiedler moved from team to team, making the roster of the Cincinnati Bengals, Philadelphia Eagles and Minnesota Vikings. They all signed him to play quarterback, but he never saw game action.

Most people in Fiedler's situation would have packed up their football gear and headed for an engineering job. But Fiedler refused to give up on his dream of playing professional football.

In 1997, he took a job that paid $1,000 to serve as a receivers coach at Hofstra University. That job eventually paved the way for him to re-enter football later that summer with Amsterdam of the World Football League.

"Why quit when I felt I had more to prove to myself? I knew I had the talent, the discipline and the drive. It was just a matter of time before I succeeded," said Fiedler.

His words became prophetic. He received his first big break as a backup quarterback with the Jacksonville Jaguars in 2000. Fiedler was so impressive that Wannstedt picked him to be the heir to retired QB legend Dan Marino.

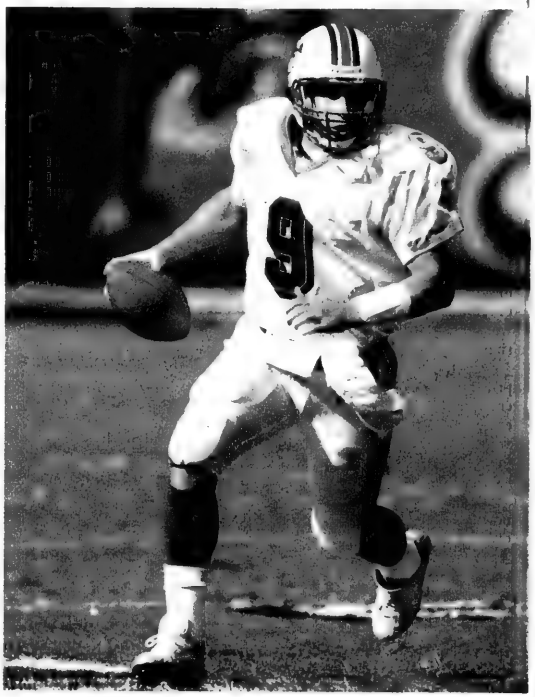
"Jay is a smart quarterback who is always ready and never makes mental mistakes. We are truly lucky to have him on our roster," Wannstedt said.

At first, many NFL writers and commentators questioned whether Fiedler would remain the starter. In fact, Fiedler has emerged as the Dolphins' most valuable player – an achievement that in the past had been reserved for Marino.

"Without a doubt, Jay's belief in himself, his ability to run and his willingness to do what he can to win has made the difference to our team," said Wannstedt.

Fiedler is one of only two NFL quarterbacks who has put together a 29-13 won-lost record in the past three seasons. In 2002, he threw for 2,024 yards, completing 179 of of 292 passes (61.3 percent) with 14 touchdowns and nine interceptions.

He has emerged as the second-best Jewish quarterback ever to play football, behind only the legendary Sid Luckman, who led the Chicago Bears to the 1946 NFL championship.



Fiedler's best season was 2002, except for the final game. He led the Dolphins to a 7-3 record and may have done even better had he not been sidelined for six games with a broken thumb.

Fiedler was most impressive in close games, where his decisions on whether to run or pass were decisive.

Playing in Denver on Oct. 13 just prior to injuring his thumb, Fiedler made the difference in a 24-22 victory. Trailing 22-21 with 45 seconds remaining, Fiedler completed a pass to Dedric Ward that set up the game winning field goal.

"What has kept me going is a belief in myself and the team. I always felt that in every game we had chances to come back when we fell behind," said Fiedler.

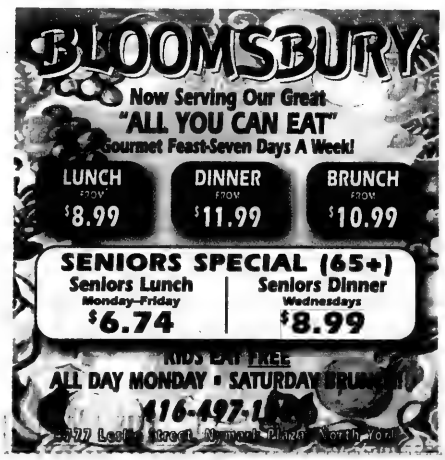
Growing up in Long Island, Fiedler developed his gritty determination and strong work ethic with help from his father Ken, a high school basketball coach who groomed many future NBA stars, including Anthony Mason.

Young Jay excelled in basketball, decathlon and football. At 16, he played basketball in the North American JCC Youth Maccabi Games.

"A lot of people thought that a Jewish guy wouldn't even start playing football for a living. My parents always encouraged me. I grew up in a Reform home and have always been proud of my Jewish heritage," said Fiedler.

His story inspires athletes everywhere who look for a second chance. A popular speaker with Jewish organizations, Fiedler shares his optimism with children.

"I tell kids when they see me what I said to myself: If you have a dream, go after it with all your heart. Do everything you feel you need to do and can do to fulfill that dream and don't let anyone tell you differently."



Can Jews and Arabs be friends?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Over the last few years, the Israeli left had hoped that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat would be a partner in peace. Right-wing Israelis generally dismissed that possibility.

Regardless of our personal commitments to a given political philosophy, I believe that, "around the Shabbat table," Israeli and Diaspora Jews desire peace with our Arab neighbours.

I believe this to be true based on the way Jews suffer when a single person is murdered or when we are required to kill.

We go through a great amount of angst when people die. Evidence of this can be seen in Jewish publications such as the Jerusalem Post and Ha'aretz, which list the names of individuals killed in terrorist attacks and include emergency numbers at the end of articles. Jews everywhere mourn the loss of each individual as if that person was part of our family or davened in our shul.

Further, it is uncustomary and inappropriate for Jews to celebrate when our enemies are killed. This is rooted in the story of the Dead Sea, when the Children of Israel were commanded not to dance and sing at the news of the death of the Egyptian army, for they were also God's creation.

Most Jews are people of peace. This is not a weakness. It is a splendid and glorious character trait.

Similarly, there are Arabs who pursue and are interested in peaceful co-existence with Israel. Although this is not the case among the decision-makers of Fatah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, there are some very credible examples of courageous Arabs who interact with Jews.

Grassroots "peace professionals" in the field today will tell you that throughout the current and previous intafadahs, Arabs and Jews have met to establish understanding and peace. There are courageous people, on both sides, whose commitment to shalom might well be worth emulating.

One such example is a grassroots program based in Israel called Seeds of Peace. Launched in 1997, its activities have included scores of school presentations, home visits, workshops, field trips to Jordan, Israel and the West Bank, and the publication of The Olive Branch – a newspaper written and edited by Seeds of Peace youth.

More than 150 Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian members have exchanged visits to each other's homes in Israel, the Palestinian Authority and the Hashemite Kingdom.

Currently, Israel is pursuing a course of assassinating terrorists while seeking a viable partner with integrity and courage. Wouldn't it also be wise to concurrently support, encourage and finance grassroots groups whose mission statements advocate ways to implement co-existence between Jews and Arabs?

Interactions at the state and political levels have succeeded somewhat in establishing a starting point for Jewish-Arab relations. Perhaps it is now time to reallocate some of our resources to grassroots programs that encourage interaction between Israelis and Arabs concerned with peace.

The Jewish soul cannot sustain the hardship of death and killing. This is evident in the biblical story of Ya'akov, who the Torah says was afraid and distressed at the news that his evil brother, Esau, was approaching his camp. The commentaries say that Ya'akov was afraid because he might be killed, and he was distressed at the possibility that he might have to kill Esau.

The time for creative solutions to this devastating war has arrived. We need to take a dramatic leap so that the bodies and souls of decent men and women cease to wither, and so that good people can shape the direction of our future, rather than terrorists.

One can resist an invasion of armies, but not an idea whose time has come.
– Victor Hugo

About Life

Dear Ella,

I recently met a really nice guy at a party. He is not yet single but soon will be, and he seems to be very proactive in trying to meet a suitable mate again. Bernie and I got to talking, and he said something that disturbed me. He said he would prefer to only date women who are mothers. At first, I just thought he was weird and that this was just another shtick that so many men I meet today have. However after he explained that only women with children would understand that he has to put his kids first, I at least understood where he was coming from.

Other than his warped way of thinking, I kind of liked this guy. Do you think I should bother to pursue him, even though I have no kids?

Kidless & Single

Dear Kidless & Single,

A very interesting view this fellow has. I would have thought that most men would prefer a woman without children – the less baggage the better – but what this guy says makes perfect sense to him.

He is fresh out of a marriage and has lost a lot. My feeling is that since he lost his family unit and his wife, he is desperate to continue being a close father to his kids and is blocking out anything that he sees as a threat to that relationship. Unfortunately, Bernie is narrowing down the field and may be missing out on some very special ladies.

I think what he really needs is time and experience: time to adjust to his new lifestyle, and the experience of meeting new women, of all kinds.

He will learn that there are some very sensitive and decent childless women out there who will understand his needs, and he will also learn that there are some mothers out there who have come last for years and are now ready to be number 1 in a man's life.

You can't pre-judge people the way Bernie has chosen to. My advice to you is that if you are not involved with him yet, move on. He has some growing and learning to do in the singles world.

Future of Canada Centre in doubt

Metulla facility facing financial crisis

Howard Weisband, director general of UIA Federations Canada's Israel office, left, and Schmuel Ben Shacham, managing director of the Canada Centre, right, presented flowers and trophies to up-and-coming young skaters at the Canada Centre rink last week. [Isranet photo]

Staff Reporter

The Canada Centre recreation complex in Metulla is in serious financial difficulty and faces the prospect of closure if it cannot put its fiscal house in order.

UIA Federations Canada, the agency that transfers community funds to Israel, plans to subsidize Canada Centre to the tune of $300,000 (all figures US) in fiscal 2002-03, and Gerry Halbert, the organization's former president, is hoping to convince "major givers" to underwrite a self-perpetuating endowment fund that would place the facility on a sounder financial footing.

"We need an endowment," Halbert said last week. "No one wants to do deficit financing."

Canada Centre has been under financial stress for at least two years. Halbert attributed the centre's problems to the violence of the intifadah, which has prompted many Israeli tourists – who made up a large part of the centre's target market – to stay home or travel abroad.

"This is a major problem," he said. "If things settled down in Israel, things would be a hell of a lot easier."

Underscoring the seriousness of the situation, Maxyne Finkelstein, executive vice-president of UIA Federations Canada, said,"There's no question that if the situation continues as it is currently, we will have to look at the future in terms of whether it [Canada Centre] is viable."

Her remarks came on the heels of comments made in Israel by Canada Centre's chair, Avie Arenson.

From the Shoah to outer space

This drawing, titled Moon Landscape, was carried into space by Col. Ilan Ramon last week on the space shuttle Columbia. It was created by Petr Ginz, a 14-year-old boy during his imprisonment in Theresienstadt. Ginz was multi-talented and at a young age had already written stories, articles and poetry. He continued to do so after being sent to Theresienstadt in 1942. In 1944, Ginz was killed in Auschwitz.

Prior to his launch, Ramon contacted Yad Vashem in Jerusalem to request a Holocaust-related item to take with him into space.

Holocaust Art Exhibit

LONDON, Ont. — An exhibit of art by Holocaust survivors and adult children of survivors living in Vancouver opened earlier this month at the Holocaust Resource Centre of the London Jewish Federation. The artists wrote and painted together to bridge the silence between generations and overcome the isolation that often follows trauma. Titled The Gesher Project: Healing Holocaust Trauma Through Writing and Painting, the collection is on a cross-country tour that has stopped in Vancouver, Victoria, Saskatoon, Edmonton and Calgary. It runs to Feb. 25 in London, its first stop east of Saskatchewan, and will be shown next in Montreal.

ISRAEL

No Coalition: Mitzna

JERUSALEM — Labor party leader Amram Mitzna says he will not join a unity government led by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. "It's us or him. Anyone who doesn't vote Labor is voting for Sharon," Mitzna said last week. Research by Labor has shown that not joining would give it three or four more seats in upcoming elections, which would come from Meretz, Shinui and the Arab parties, Ha'aretz reported.

New Hamas Weapons?

JERUSALEM — Hamas said last week it has received a large number of rocket-propelled grenade launchers and has produced new, advanced rockets. The group did not specify quantities, but said the acquisitions represented "qualitative advances in confronting the Zionist enemy," Associated Press reported. But in a statement posted on its official Web site, Hamas later denied it has the weapons, saying if it did, it would announce it by using them against Israel.

Israel on Tap

JERUSALEM — Hamat, Israel's largest faucet maker, has signed a marketing agreement with The Great Indoors (TGI), a Sears subsidiary, valued at $1.5 million (US) that will put Hamat's taps in 22 stores in the United States. Avigdor Cohen, general manager of Merhav, Hamat's parent company, said the deal is part of the company's strategy to expand exports.

WORLD

Secret Saudi Ads

NEW YORK — Saudi Arabia, using Washington, D.C.-based PR firm Qorvis Communications, secretly spent $679,000 (US) on anti-Israel radio ads that ran in 15 U.S. cities last spring, Time magazine reported last week. Qorvis initially said the ads were sponsored by a consortium of Mideast policy groups called the Alliance for Peace and Justice. But in a filing with the U.S. Justice Department last month, Qorvis revealed the funding actually came from the Saudi government, Time reported. The Saudis spent at least $14.6 million (US) on anti-Israel public relations in the United States last year, according to the New York Sun.

Arab Olympic Threats

ATHENS — Islamic extremist groups have reportedly threatened to bomb the 2004 Olympic Games in Athens if security is assigned to SAIC Team, a consortium that includes Israeli firms. Arab nations are also threatening to boycott the games if the consortium gets the security contract, the Greek newspaper Avriani reported. Greece also is reportedly concerned that one of the Israeli security companies on the team has signed a co-operation deal with Turkey, Greece's longtime rival.

Mass Bar Mitzvah

MOSCOW — A bar mitzvah ceremony was held for 52 boys from Moscow and other parts of Russia on Jan. 12 in a ceremony believed to be the largest such celebration ever held in the region. It took place at Moscow's Marina Roscha Synagogue on the 52nd anniversary of the date the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, assumed the leadership of the Chabad movement.

Supremacist Arrested

CHICAGO — The Anti-Defamation League has applauded the arrest earlier this month in Chicago of the leader of the virulently anti-Semitic World Church of the Creator. Matthew Hale was arrested on charges that between Nov. 29 and Dec. 17 he attempted to get someone to murder U.S. Judge Joan Humphrey Lefkow, who had been presiding over a trademark case involving his group. "We have long known his propensity for violence," said Richard Hirschhaut, the ADL's Chicago regional director.

New Exam for Papon

PARIS — Nazi-era war criminal Maurice Papon could soon be returned to a French prison. Papon, a senior Vichy official sentenced to 10 years in jail for his role in the deportation of more than 1,500 Jews in wartime France, has been ordered to undergo a medical re-examination later this month, his lawyer confirmed last week. Papon was released from prison last year after an appeals court ruled he was too old and sick to serve out his 10-year sentence. The move created a storm of protest, especially after Papon was seen leaving the prison unassisted.

Muslim Man Foils Arson Attempt on Shul

NEW YORK — A Muslim man from Pakistan helped save a Brooklyn synagogue from an arson attempt earlier this month.

Syed Ali, 35, an attendant at an Amoco gas station across the street from Congregation Young Israel of Kings Bay, became suspicious when another man came by several times to fill a container with gasoline at around 4 a.m.

Ali called police when he saw the man dousing the synagogue with the gasoline. Police soon arrived at the scene and arrested the alleged perpetrator, Sead Jakup, 22, a Bosnian Muslim.

Police said Jakup told them he wanted to "get back at the Jews."

The gas station attendant, who was applauded by local Jewish officials and politicians, said his religious beliefs prompted him to contact the police.

"It's a sacred place he was going to destroy," Ali told the New York Daily News.

Jakup, who had reportedly been fired a few days earlier from his job as an apprentice labourer for the city's department of environmental protection, was charged with third-degree arson.

Debate cancelled, CBC protest goes on

A debate about the CBC's coverage of the Middle East that would have pitted Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel, against CBC News chief Tony Burman has been cancelled.

Spector, who has accused the national broadcaster of anti-Israel bias, pulled out of the debate last week saying its format, in which he would have faced three CBC representatives, would have been weighted against him.

Meanwhile, two grassroots community groups held separate protests outside the CBC's Toronto headquarters last week. Betar-Tagar and Canadians Against Anti-Semitism (CAAS) protested the network's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

CAAS founder Sandra Stern said the CBC's unbalanced coverage was "facilitating and contributing to anti-Semitism" in Canada.

Torontonian Bruce Gilboord (right) was one of about 20 demonstrators at a rally last week outside CBC's Toronto headquarters, organized by Canadians Against Anti-Semitism, who were protesting against what they consider the network's biased coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Imagining Jewish history

From the editor's desk

In this column, I take a short respite from commentary on the upcoming elections in Israel to discuss literature.

The term "Jewish continuity" is less frequently heard these days than it was a decade ago, although it is no less on the minds of parents, grandparents, educators, community leaders and Jewish newspaper editors.

The extent to which there is continuity of peoplehood and traditions will be determined not by what we inherit from our parents, but rather by what we pass on to our children.

There are reasons for which to feel glum about the Jewish future: the recently released, declining population figure for world Jewry, for example.

But there are also many reasons for which to feel a surge of optimism and confidence about the Jewish future. One of those reasons is the proliferation of Jewish education and learning – formal and informal, child and adult – around the Jewish world.

One of the results of increased Jewish learning has been an increase in "Jewish" writing: classical, scholarly, fiction and poetry.

Especially gratifying has been the relatively recent emergence of a new crop of writers who are applying their considerable creative skills to modern Jewish history through the medium of the novel.

In Canada, Anne Michaels and Lillian Nattel, who wrote the widely celebrated and much acclaimed novels Fugitive Pieces and The River Midnight, respectively, are exemplars of bold, innovative new writers imagining the Jewish past while delving into the condition of the Jewish present.

In the United States, two new novelists and their recently published works are also worthy of our attention.

Dara Horn is 25 years old, a doctoral candidate in comparative literature at Harvard University, studying Hebrew and Yiddish. Her novel, In The Image, is a deeply entertaining, thoughtful, instructive, provocative work, all the more remarkable because it is her first.

At its core, the book is a meditation on the current state of Jewish life in America. But it is a meditation that carries the reader on broad shoulders through a beautiful construction of multiple, interrelated, trans-generational storylines.

The anonymous narrator tells the fascinating tale of Leora, a complex, strong-willed individual who evolves in age and in maturity across time and continents.

The book opens when Leora is a young teenager, with the narrator's announcement of the accidental death of her best friend, Naomi. Naomi's death, in many respects, is the seminal event in the novel. Naomi's grandfather plays a pivotal role in the story, both prospectively, in the way he influences Leora's life, and retrospectively, as the narrator recounts the important events and stages in his faraway past.

The author has carefully plotted tender and delicate narratives around the lives of a number of characters. These narratives are all neatly and gratifyingly resolved by novel's end.

In addition, and so very rare in a work by a writer still so young, are the constant allusions and infusions of references to classic Jewish sources. Indeed, the penultimate chapter is a summary of the book's narrative told as a stylized replication of the Book of Job.

Horn has a particularly splendid writing style that liberally incorporates clever, colourful, often moving imagery. One of the novel's key images, for example, is a set of tfillin abandoned and decaying at the bottom of the sea, cast away at the start of the immigrant's new life in America. The fate of this abandoned set of tefillin is the novel's encapsulating metaphor.

The Bone Weaver, by Victoria Zackheim, also opens with the death of the key character's best friend. That death sets in motion a process of severe introspection and soul-searching by Mimi, the middle-aged protagonist, that lasts a year, the traditional period of mourning.

At the heart of the introspection, however, is the turbulent relationship between Mimi and her mother Rivka, a pre-war immigrant to the United States from Nowy Zycie, Poland. It is this relationship that propels the novel forward.

But to allow her readers to understand the relationship, the author "explains" Rivka's character by recounting the story of her life.

The Bone Weaver has therefore two parallel narratives: Mimi's story in the present, Rivka's story in the past. The two narratives, of course, intersect in the novel's resolution.

Zackheim's book is as much an excursion into history as it is into human relationships.

* * *

In all of us there is a pilot light of Jewish identity. In some, it burns bright; in others, it barely flickers. The great reward in reading novels such as In The Image and The Bone Weaver is to realize that they are the pilot lights burning in two fine new writers and to hope that these lights might, in turn, ignite in others.

Ceremony marks first annual Wallenberg day

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Swedish war hero Raoul Wallenberg, whose fate remains a mystery, has bequeathed a legacy of human rights and the need to bear witness to the horrors of the Holocaust, says a member of Parliament and Wallenberg expert.

Wallenberg, who is credited with rescuing 100,000 Hungarian Jews from the Nazis – "more than any single government – was the embodiment of the Talmudic idiom that he who saves one life is as though he saved an entire universe," Liberal MP Irwin Cotler told a gathering in Toronto last week held to mark the inaugural Raoul Wallenberg Day.

Last June, Parliament proclaimed Jan. 17 – the anniversary of Wallenberg's disappearance – as Raoul Wallenberg Day to commemorate and pay tribute to the Swedish diplomat's daring and bravery in Budapest in the latter half of 1944.

In 1985, Wallenberg was named Canada's first honorary citizen.

The scion of a wealthy Swedish banking and industrial family, Wallenberg, a non-Jew, was dispatched to the Hungarian capital by the U.S. War Refugee Board to rescue as many Jews as he could.

He worked feverishly to spirit more than 30,000 Jews to 32 "safe houses" in Budapest, which flew the neutral Swedish flag, and to crank out thousands of false passports, called "Schutzpasses," which placed their bearers under the protection of Sweden.

He also persuaded the Nazis to call off their destruction of Budapest's Jewish ghetto, with its 70,000 inhabitants.

Known for his bluff and bluster, Wallenberg would literally yank people out of death marches and lines for Auschwitz-bound trains to issue them the fake passports.

Irwin Cotler

But the invading Red Army took Wallenberg into "protective custody" on Jan. 17, 1945, thus beginning one of the most enduring mysteries of the 20th century. He was never seen again, save for alleged sightings by former prisoners of the Soviet gulag, and became the subject of several high-level investigations.

Despite plenty of evidence to the contrary, the Soviets stuck to the same story for decades: that Wallenberg died of a heart attack in 1947 while in prison.

Cotler, who headed a commission of inquiry into Wallenberg's fate and whereabouts in the late 1980s, said the Swede must be considered "disappeared, not deceased."

Cotler's 1,200-page report, delivered in 1990 after years of research and interviews with dozens of witnesses, concluded there was "compelling" evidence that Wallenberg was alive during the '50s and '60s, and "credible" evidence he lived into the '70s and perhaps as late as 1981.

In 1991, Sweden and Russia announced they would conduct a joint inquiry into Wallenberg's fate. Their reports, delivered separately two years ago, conflicted.

The Swedes cited evidence that Wallenberg may have died in a psychiatric facility as late as 1989, but that in the absence of hard evidence, he must be considered a missing person.

Raoul Wallenberg

The Russian report stuck to the same line: That Wallenberg died in Soviet custody in 1947. Moscow said any further inquiry was pointless.

(However, only a month earlier, the Kremlin acknowledged for the first time that Wallenberg and his driver had been arrested as "socially dangerous" individuals, and said that Wallenberg had been shot in 1947 as an American spy.)

In 1998, another Canadian, Winnipeg-based human rights lawyer David Matas, released the findings of his own research, which charged the Soviets and Russians with conducting a massive coverup on the file.

Cotler said last week the evidence that Wallenberg did not die in 1947 is "incontrovertible," and that the "smoking gun" in the case is still locked in secret KGB archives.

Also on hand at last week's commemoration were the consuls general of Sweden, Hungary and Israel, who brought greetings, and Yvonne Singer, a York University art teacher who found out in 1979 that Wallenberg was her godfather.

Singer recounted that her mother gave birth to her in Wallenberg's own bed because Budapest's hospitals were under siege. In gratitude, he agreed to be Singer's godfather.

Meantime, Wallenberg offers many lessons for today, Cotler told about 250 people at the program, held by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

"He showed us it is possible to confront, resist and unmask evil, and to overcome it. It's a call to bear witness."

Quoting Elie Wiesel – that neutrality equals siding with the victimizer – Cotler warned of the dangers of turning away.

"Averting our eyes to evil is to become an accomplice to evil, which is to acquiesce to evil, which is complicity in evil."

He slammed an "indifferent and callous" international community for "waffling" on mass murders in the Balkans, and the "only too preventable" genocide in Rwanda. "This resulted in our being accomplices."

Part of Wallenberg's legacy is "the moral and juridical imperative" to expose evil, Cotler said.

He also warned of "new, global trafficking in hate and state-sanctioned anti-Semitism, the likes of which have not been seen since the end of World War II."

As for Wallenberg, "I'm not saying he's alive. I'm only saying that based on the evidence, the fairest thing to say, morally and legally, is that he remains the lost hero of the Holocaust."

Jews must stay in Hebron, community spokesperson says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

David Wilder, a grey-bearded modern Orthodox Jew from the embattled West Bank city of Hebron, held aloft a thick leather-bound book punctured in the middle by a bullet hole.

There were gasps from the audience at Shaarei Teffilah Congregation last week as he displayed the red volume that an unknown Palestinian shooter had damaged.

The book, he explained, was from his personal library. His son had found it while dusting his books.

Wilder, the English spokesperson of Hebron's besieged Jewish community, cited the ragged hole in the book as yet another example of the dire physical dangers some 800 Jews face in this ethnically, religiously and politically divided town of some 100,000 inhabitants.

Wilder, an American who made aliyah, said his home has been shot at twice. But he stoically shrugged off the shootings that Hebron's Jewish enclaves are subjected to by Palestinian gunmen.

Jews in Hebron – the home of the patriarch Abraham and the original site of King David's biblical kingdom – have no alternative but to grin and bear it, Wilder said.

"If you run away from terror, it runs after you," he declared. "You can't escape it."

Hebron, the only major Arab city in the Palestinian autonomous areas with a Jewish presence, has been a flashpoint of the Arab-Israeli dispute for more than 70 years.

In 1929, when Palestine was under British administration, 67 Jews were massacred in a pogrom, forcing the dissolution of the venerable community.

Some Jews went back in 1931, only to be ousted by an Arab rebellion in 1936, the precursor of the first Palestinian uprising in 1987 and the current intifadah, which began in September 2000.

Jews returned to Hebron after Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War, resettling the old Jewish Quarter and the neighbourhoods of Beit Hadassah, Beit Schneerson and Tel Rumeida.

In 1997, as part of the Oslo peace process, former Israeli prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu relinquished 80 per cent of Hebron to the Palestinian Authority and kept the rest for Israel.

As Wilder said, Jews in Hebron live with the constant threat of violence.

In 1980, Palestinian terrorists murdered six Jews, including a Montreal yeshiva student, as they walked toward Beit Hadassah.

In 1994, Baruch Goldstein, a Brooklyn doctor living in Kiryat Arba, a settlement adjacent to Hebron, killed 29 Palestinian worshippers in a Hebron mosque.

Last November, in the worst incident of its kind since the Six Day War, Palestinian snipers ambushed a group of Israeli soldiers, police and security guards in Hebron, killing 12 of them.

Wilder said that Jews cannot abandon Hebron, which he described as "the first Jewish city in Israel."

He added, "You don't abandon your roots. You just don't do that. And that's why we can't leave Hebron."

Wilder, whose talk was supplemented by a video titled Hebron: Past, Present & Forever, acknowledged that the past two years have been difficult.

But Jews have no choice but to remain in Hebron and fight back, he said, saying the Palestinians' ultimate goal is Tel Aviv and Haifa, or Israel itself.

More Jews want to settle in Hebron, but there is no place for them, he said, adding that the Israeli government issues few building permits.

Jews in the Diaspora can help by visiting Hebron and by making financial contributions, he said.

He urged "the entire Jewish world" to work against the establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

"It can and must be stopped."

A Palestinian state would be a "terrorist entity" in the backyard of the only democracy in the Middle East, Wilder said.

During a question-and-answer session, he said he agreed with the view that Israel must "get rid of" Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat.

But in the next breath, Wilder suggested Arafat may be useful to Israel. As long as Arafat remains head of the Palestinian Authority, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will not negotiate on substantive issues with the Palestinians.

"Perhaps we're better off the way we are," he said. "Abu Babu" might be worse, he said, referring generically to Arafat's potential successors.

Asked how he reacts to the idea of "transferring" Arabs out of the West Bank, Wilder said that if Jews can be forced to leave their homes there, so can Palestinians.

Without elaborating, he said the day may come when Palestinians are sent packing. "We haven't reached that point yet."

Wilder said Palestinians willing to live in peace with Jews should be allowed to stay, but without Knesset voting rights.

Palestinians who cannot coexist with Jews should resettle themselves in Arab states, he said.

Wilder's talk was sponsored by the Toronto Zionist Council and Shaarei Teffilah Congregation.

Delta and El Al expand partnership

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

El Al Israel Airlines and the U.S. carrier Delta have expanded their codesharing partnership to include the Toronto-Los Angeles route.

The new agreement, which came into effect in early December, will allow Delta to book its passengers on El Al flights to and from Los Angeles. El Al operates three flights per week to Los Angeles on its Boeing 777 wide-bodied aircraft.

The deal marks the first time the codesharing partnership is being applied to a route that doesn't originate or end in Israel, said Stanley Morais, sales and marketing manager for El Al in Canada.

Until now, the agreement allowed Delta to ticket its passengers directly through to Tel Aviv from various cities across the United States. Delta passengers from Atlanta, Cincinnati, Salt Lake City, Dallas-Fort Worth, Phoenix, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle and Washington, D.C. would be flown to JFK in New York City and transferred onto an El Al aircraft for the flight to Israel. The deal made for more seamless travel for Delta passengers heading to the Jewish state, Morais said.

The addition of the Toronto-Los Angeles route gives Delta the option of providing its passengers with a low-cost, direct flight to the southern California city. Instead of travelling from Toronto to Delta hubs in New York or Atlanta to catch a flight to Los Angeles, passengers can now fly directly to southern California, saving three or four hours of travel time, Morais said.

During the Christmas holiday season, the Toronto-L.A. route was fully booked and overall for the month of December, El Al's aircraft flew the route at 80 per cent capacity. Delta passengers only made up a portion of those travellers. El Al has stepped up its advertising to the general market and the effort paid off with a broad assortment of passenger traffic, Morais said.

> 'I'm going to Israel for myself'

"All kinds of people from southwest Ontario were taking our flights to L.A. for the Christmas holidays," he said. Some continue on Delta flights for vacations in Hawaii or Fiji, he added.

Price was a factor as was El Al's reputation for security, Morais said, adding that business travellers in the airline's Platinum class also like the full meal service, the personal entertainment monitor and hookup for laptop computers.

Flights from Toronto to Tel Aviv were also fully booked during December. "It was heartwarming to see all these people going to Tel Aviv. People were saying, 'I'm going to Israel for myself. I think it's important for me as a Jew,'" he said.

Despite high volume in December, El Al's overall numbers for 2002 dropped 40 per cent – both for the Toronto-Tel Aviv route and for the airline as a whole, as tourist traffic to Israel continues to be decimated by the Palestinian intifadah, Morais said.

Law: lacking and undeserving of respect

Louis D. Brandeis, former justice of the Supreme Court of the United States once wrote that "if we desire respect for the law, we must first make the law respectable." Were Brandeis alive today to observe some of the moral inversions and unprincipled twistings that pass for law in the international arena, he would undoubtedly bridle with disgust. Or he would weep.

Two examples from the news of last week will illustrate the point.

In Belgium, a legislative committee of Parliament has decided to amend its war crimes legislation, which purports to confer on the people of Belgium the right to charge and to try anyone in the world for behaviour deemed in their eyes to be war crimes. Under the Belgian legislation, charges were laid last year against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for his alleged involvement in the crimes against the Palestinians in Sabra and Shatila in Lebanon in 1982. That charges were not brought against the man who actually led the Christian Falange forces that committed the slaughter of the Palestinians seemed not to bother the Belgian prosecutors or legislators. They were determined to put Sharon and only Sharon into the prisoner's dock in a court in Brussels.

Sensibly enough, the High Court in Belgium ruled that the hand of the Belgian Parliament could not and should not extend to individuals who were not on Belgian soil. The attempt to reach into Israel, as it were, to charge Sharon for alleged war crimes was correctly deemed unlawful.

Not easily deterred, however, by law, morality, or even common sense, Belgian lawmakers have decided to amend their war crimes legislation to expressly confer the right to charge individuals, even if they are not in Belgium. The Belgian prime minister announced that he would not oppose the amendment.

The aim of the Belgian legislators is transparent; nor are they embarrassed by this transparency. They are determined, by hook or by crook, to charge and to try Sharon as a war criminal.

In Geneva, at the headquarters of the United Nations Commission for Human Rights, an announcement was made that the African bloc of nations, from whose ranks must be chosen the next chair of the commission, would nominate Libya to be chair.

Human rights and Libya are not compatible concepts. They are not terminologies that rest easily alongside each other. Libya is a totalitarian police state. Its record of abuses is long and well-documented. To suggest, let alone nominate, Libya as chair of the world's highest body for the promotion and encouragement of respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all, is a cheap trick, a dizzying act of disdain. Human rights are scorned.

War crimes law in Brussels, human rights law in Geneva lack all moral meaning. The law has become a sham, lacking, and undeserving of, any respect. Louis Brandeis would weep. So should we.

Peace Now not united, either

Peace Now supporters in Israel and the Diaspora were severely demoralized when the second intifadah began after Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat rejected former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's generous offers at Camp David and, particularly, at Taba. Many in Israel left the organization's ranks, more so than in the Diaspora. Understandably, those on the front lines were more critically disillusioned by the failure of the peace process and negotiations than those who were not.

But it would be a serious mistake to believe that among Peace Now followers, both those who stayed and those who left, there is any less support for the fundamental principals of a two-state solution espoused at Taba now than before. Most centrist, mainstream Israelis, even while supporting many of Sharon's essential defensive military measures, recognize the demographic, political and moral imperatives for a permanent separation from Palestinians.

Peace Now never claimed, as letter writer Kenny Fisher says, that only "relinquishing lands captured in 1967 will solve the conflict with the Palestinians" ("Flawed Peace Now logic I," Letters to the Editor, CJN, Dec. 19). Of course, other issues, such as the Palestinians' insistence on the right of return of Palestinian refugees, also undermined the peace process. Peace Now has always said that the settlements are a great strategic and economic liability and a major obstacle to reconciliation with the Palestinians. Most Israelis at the centre agree. Poll after poll indicates they are ready to negotiate both settlements and territory at the right time and for the right price.

The controversy is, how should they do this, and with whom do they negotiate with on the Palestinian side? Just as there is no unity within Israel on these matters, there is none within Peace Now. Its goal in the upcoming election is to mobilize support for the voices of moderation within Israel. And in this goal, ironically, Peace Now probably has the silent support of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Jew-haters, not anti-Semites

In a recent letter to The CJN (Dec. 5, 2002), David Burstein suggests we stop using the so-called "euphemisms" "anti-Semitism" and "anti-Semitic."

A Semite is defined as a member of the Jewish or Arab language group. One reputable dictionary defines an anti-Semite as someone who is hostile to Jews or who opposes Zionism or the State of Israel. The definition of anti-Semite creates ambiguity and confusion. Arabs frequently claim they can not be anti-Semites because they are Semites.

But Burstein's suggestion that we use "Judaism hatred" rather than "anti-Semitism" does not adequately address the problem. In today's world, it is seldom the Jewish religion that is reviled by Jew-haters. The Ten Commandments and the concept of monotheism are rarely targets of condemnation. The Jewish people are despised and excoriated for not belonging to another religious group for supporting the State of Israel and they are used as scapegoats for other people's problems.

People who hate Jews for being Jews should be called what they are: "Jew-haters." Calling them anti-Semites or Judaism haters is a spurious effort to spare Jew-haters the loathsome title they deserve.

Justice and PR important for Israel

I am astounded to see television news reports on Palestinians being evicted and their homes confiscated. This kind of news can only provoke sympathy for suicide bombers. The punishment of an entire family because of terrorists should not be condoned. It does not reflect well on Jews when innocent people are punished for the evil of others.

The argument that all of the Holy Land belongs only to the Jews is not realistic given current events and recent history. What happened 2,000 years ago does not justify moving a family that had resided in that home for several generations during contemporary times. That is like North American Indians demanding the return of Manhattan.

Israelis and Jews cannot ignore that this kind of act and that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon are bad public relations for all Jews.

Israel certainly has a right to defend itself and pursue terrorists, but it should do so in a fair and honourable way. Jews know how it feels to be evicted from a place that has been their home for several generations. We must realize that in addition to justice, public relations is important to Israel both economically and politically.

A Canadian war grave

On a visit last summer to the grave of my great-uncle at the Commonwealth War Graves Commission's cemetery at Cassino, Italy, I found three other Jewish graves. Among them was that of Private C. M. Fried of the Seaforth Highlanders of Canada, who died May 23, 1944, at the age of 30.

I placed a Royal British Legion Magen David with a poppy attached on the grave. I have photographs of the gravestone and of the cemetery, which I should be happy to send to any relatives.

There is at least one Canadian war grave in the Jewish cemetery in Leeds, upon which I place a poppy each Remembrance Sunday. If this letter provokes any enquiries about graves in Leeds, please write to me at 4 Broomhill Crescent, Leeds, UK, LS17 6HG.

Perspectives

Mizrachi: 100 years of challenges

By SAMUEL KAPUSTIN

On April 3 and 4, 1902, 72 Orthodox Jews, including 24 rabbis, as well as a number of non-Orthodox Jews gathered in Vilna, Lithuania with the goal of establishing a new faction within the emerging World Zionist Organization (WZO). The immediate impetus for the gathering was a decision by the Fifth Zionist Congress the previous year to widen Zionist activity beyond the political and practical to include cultural and educational efforts. Why did that decision prompt the formation of this new group, which adopted the name Mizrachi? What was the ideological and political context within which its leaders were struggling? And can the answers to these questions provide today's religious Zionist movement with any guidance as it seeks to continue the program of the Vilna fathers?

Zionism arose in Europe at the end of the 19th century primarily for two reasons: the failure of non-Jewish society to provide legal and often even physical security for Jews, and the cultural ferment within Jewish society that challenged traditional Jewish identity. All Jews, whether consciously or not, were confronted by the apparent failure of the Emancipation to fulfil their expectations in the West or to achieve a foothold in the East.

Consequently, the Jew was not only increasingly disappointed by the precariousness of his political and economic position, he was often estranged from both his Jewish past and unable to find acceptance in his non-Jewish present. To be sure, Orthodoxy, both in its chassidic and mitnagdic variations, was often dominant in most of eastern Europe, but a host of secular ideologies had inflicted innumerable breaches in its protective bastion. Jews were looking elsewhere for the answers that traditional Jewish society seemed no longer able to provide.

Most Jews opted for one of the many solutions heralded in Jewish society, abandoning Jewish identity (assimilation), forsaking their European home for more hospitable environs (emigration), transforming European society through political activity (liberalism) or more extreme methods, including revolution (socialism).

A minority, however, rejected all of these options in the rather strange belief that the only realistic solution to the "Jewish problem" was a return to the ancestral land of Israel, where Jews would be safe to pursue their own path. The question was, however, should Zionism be viewed as a solution to the problem or as a more virulent form of it.

Since the advent of the Jewish Enlightenment (Haskalah) in the West at the end of the 18th century and its transfer to the East in the 19th, most Orthodox leaders adopted a defensive stance against what they felt was a secularist attack on the essence of halachic society. Whether in East or West, few rabbis could distinguish between the political and economic benefits of Emancipation and the cultural challenges they entailed. "All that is new is forbidden by the Torah" was the famous phrase of the Hatam Sofer. As much as this approach could safeguard the religiosity of those who became its adherents, most Jews were susceptible to the temptations of the new European context, much to the chagrin of rabbinic leaders.

The Zionist movement emerged in the midst of this crisis. Theodor Herzl's ideas were not new, but the forcefulness of his presentation and the power of his personality came precisely at the moment when the crisis was at its height. By 1897, anti-Semitism seemed resurgent and assimilation a permanent threat. Jews from all sectors of society saw in Herzl's message the promise of some sort of redemption.

The problem was, of course, that "Zionism" meant different things to different people. At the time, many of the religious leadership, including in eastern Europe, were sympathetic to a movement that might unite all Jews and provide a respite from the hardships created by anti-Semitic regimes. Coupled with the euphoria surrounding the First Zionist Congress, Herzl's persona assumed an almost messianic aura among the eastern European masses. That the idea of a Jewish state suddenly appeared, if only theoretically, on the European diplomatic agenda raised the hopes of countless Jews, regardless of their religious or ideological affiliation.

Typical of those who saw promise in the new movement was Rabbi Yitzhak Yaakov Reines, a prominent Lithuanian Talmudic scholar. Reines had worked previously with the early Zionist thinker Rabbi Zvi Hirsch Kalischer and had been active in the Hibbat Tsiyon movement, seeking to raise funds among the Orthodox to promote settlement in Palestine.

Yet, his enthusiastic participation in the Zionist movement elicited criticism from many rabbinic colleagues, including no less a figure than the Chafetz Chaim, who warned Rabbi Reines that his Zionist activity would severely compromise his standing in the Orthodox world and endanger his personal and professional reputation.

What disturbed the anti-Zionist rabbinic majority so that they could not find common cause with Rabbi Reines and his followers?

The fundamental issue was not one of "forcing the hand of the Messiah." This argument only become a major part of the ideological arsenal against Zionism long after the battle lines were drawn between pro- and anti-Zionist Orthodoxy. The conflict centred upon the essence and goals of Zionism.

Rabbi Reines claimed that Zionism was not a messianic movement, that its goals were not religious, but practical and material. That is, it sought the creation of a haven from anti-Semitism and secure livelihoods for the impoverished Jews of eastern Europe.

"Anyone who thinks that the Zionist idea is somehow associated with future redemption and the coming of the Messiah and who therefore regards it as undermining our holy faith is clearly in error. Zionism has nothing whatsoever to do with the question of redemption. The entire point of this idea is merely the improvement of the condition of our wretched brethren," he once said.

Therefore, Rabbi Reines believed Zionism should not be viewed as an attack on Orthodoxy. The fact many early settlers and most Zionist leaders were secular was, in his view, inconsequential in light of the greater good that Zionism could provide for the Jewish people as a whole. As long as the movement defined itself in these practical terms, focusing on gaining political support and the gradual acquisition of land in Palestine, many rabbis could tolerate, if not accept, Rabbi Reines' interpretation.

However, the increasingly bitter attacks on Orthodoxy and its equally vehement reactions in the burgeoning eastern European Jewish press belied Rabbi Reines' optimism. The problem was not simply the act of working together with secularists within the Zionist movement. More importantly, the secularists' goals seemed totally contradictory to those of Orthodoxy, a fact that could not be deflected by a common devotion to the land of Israel.

In truth, Zionism meant much more to the majority of its non-Orthodox supporters. Where the Haskalah had begun the transformation of Jewish society, freeing it from the shackles of Orthodox legalism, they saw Zionism as an attempt to complete the process. In short, a Jewish state was not to be simply or primarily a refuge from anti-Semitism, but the catalyst for the rebirth of Jewish culture and values. Its non-Orthodox supporters saw secular Zionism as the antidote to religion, which many secular Zionists believed had nearly succeeded in extinguishing the Jewish spirit.

The true nature of the conflict became clear at the Fifth Congress, where, despite the best efforts of Herzl and other political Zionists, culture and education became a prime focus of Zionist activity. For the anti-Zionist Orthodox, Zionism was now revealed in its true colours and had to be opposed at every turn. The Zionist movement was nothing less than a frontal assault on Torah and halachah. For religious Zionists, the push toward Zionist education could be seen in the larger perspective of the Zionist program.

In Rabbi Reines' view, it was infinitely better for Jews to be involved in a secular movement with questionable Jewish content, one that held out the hope of future religious identification, rather than to risk the loss of legions of Jews repelled by their mistaken understanding of Orthodoxy.

This was a difficult position for most Orthodox to embrace.

As Rabbi Eliezer Gordon of Telz, Poland, said: "I'm not against Zionism. Quite the contrary, it contains much that is good, in that it returns the wayward to the bosom of their nation. But Zionism is like the red heifer: it purifies the impure and defiles the pure."

For most Orthodox, this was a chance they were unwilling to take, especially since it conferred on Zionism an equivalent status to religion and gave it legitimacy as an alternative form of Judaism.

Viewed in this context, the Vilna conference that established Mizrachi was an attempt to salvage the role of the religious faction in the Zionist movement by providing it with a structure and direction that would maintain and attract more religious Jews to its efforts.

In many respects, it was a losing battle. Rabbi Reines' hopes of uniting Orthodox and non-Orthodox in a common enterprise had no hope of fulfillment, and most Orthodox Jews became staunchly anti-Zionist. Mizrachi's continued support for Herzl, its view that Zionism had nothing to do with religion and its later acceptance of the Uganda plan frustrated anti-Zionist Orthodox and pro-Zionist secularists alike.

The immediate results of the 1902 conference reflect this dilemma. The religious delegates at Vilna were forced to compose a manifesto that the political Zionists would be willing to accept: Mizrachi would only monitor educational activities in the movement, in order to limit such activity as much as possible, rather than to promote its own religious-cultural agenda. In principle, at this stage, even the non-Orthodox could join Mizrachi, as long as they were committed to Zionist goals and opposed all cultural efforts within the WZO, whether religious or secular.

The challenge of implementing a religious ideology within a political movement would continue to plague Mizrachi throughout its history.

In the words of Rabbi Isaac Nissenbaum: "We 'Orthodox Zionists' are caught between the hammer and the anvil. We are unable and do not wish to give up a single letter of our Torah, nor a single clause of Zionism. We honour and esteem both the standard-bearers of Torah and the champions of Zionism. We want to obey the former in every matter, and are compelled to deviate from that discipline and rebel against our rabbis and leaders, to reprove them publicly and thus diminish, though unintentionally, their influence! Master of the World, what can we do?"

The tension between these conflicting goals highlighted Mizrachi's need to develop a comprehensive ideology that could both deflect Orthodox criticism and provide a consistent justification to its supporters.

Even those who identified with religious Zionist goals often criticized Mizrachi for this inconsistency. Chief among these was Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, who never fully accepted Mizrachi's political agenda.

Mizrachi did refine and develop its ideology so that religion became a focus of its Zionism. Its leaders, however, confronted with the political realities of the Yishuv and the State, continued the struggle to maintain the balance between the practical and the ideal. As perhaps could be expected, haredi anti- and non-Zionists who reject the basic premises of religious Zionism continue to use this as a weapon against it.

Of greater concern today, perhaps, is the degree to which contemporary religious Zionists, in whatever movements or parties, succeed in transmitting the validity of Mizrachi's original message, no matter the tensions it involves.

In a 1987 address, Rav Aharon Lichtenstein spoke about the difficulties in striking a positive balance between Jewish and general studies in modern Orthodox education.

"Our opponents would accuse us of trying to square the circle and suggest that we abandon the attempt. This we do not accept. We believe it is possible to combine the best of both worlds…To be successful, we must accept the difficult task of clarifying our own priorities, so that we can confidently confront the specific challenges that await us."

It is no accident that the founder of Mizrachi went on to establish a yeshiva in Lida, the first to combine traditional Jewish studies with general education. Nor is it remarkable that the name Mizrachi is really an abbreviation for "merkaz ruhani," meaning that the new society that would develop in the Land of Israel should become a spiritual centre for the entire Jewish people.

As Rabbi Reines knew well, the struggle is not simply over the future of Zionism, but rather over the future of the Jewish soul itself.

Welcome to my world

I love my job! I am an assistant professor of religion at Concordia University. I can hear your response: "How can she? That place is a hotbed of anti-Semitism."

Concordia has certainly been in the news lately. And the recent and not-so-recent events bring shame to it and its constituents. But! Concordia is a wonderful school and it has nourished me as a scholar when other institutions rejected me and my subject – gender and religion. A recent study revealed that I teach more diverse courses on women and Judaism than any other professor in North America. Obviously, I have been encouraged to grow in my chosen field. It is a Jewish principle to acknowledge the good wherever it is found (hakarat hatov).

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

However, I must equally acknowledge the growing sense of indignation and alienation that has overwhelmed me. On Sept. 9, 2002, my husband, Rabbi Howard Joseph, and I were punched and kicked on our way to a lecture.

I called security three times without response. The administration countered that nothing could be done. How is that possible? It was disconcerting to find myself literally out on the street at our own institution. They even expelled Hillel!

How can these things happen in Canada? At Concordia? How can an institution of higher learning be so used and abused? Where is academic integrity? Where is freedom of speech? How can the victim be blamed?

Most students and faculty are opposed to the blatant intolerance exposed by recent events. Yet most sit back and do nothing, and we know the results of such apathy.

Concordia is not the only hub of rabid anti-Israel and anti-Jewish activity. Perhaps anti-Semitism is intensifying, or its deep roots are being freshly exposed. Unquestionably, we are finding its ugliness in unfamiliar places. Factions from the Islamic world have taken over Christian perversions, and one Native North American discourse displayed deep-seated hatred. Where did this come from? I do not know, but I am unwilling to be silent. Too much is at stake for Jews, Canadians, scholars and universities.

What to do? In addition to the proposals now in motion, I would add two: We must support Jewish students worldwide. Communal strategies are being implemented to combat anti-Semitism on campuses, but such crisis intervention is not sufficient. Our colleges do not have adequate support for an active Jewish student life. Continuous programming of diverse Jewish content is the best response. Our students need to claim space on campus and they need our assistance.

Additionally, we cannot abandon places such as Concordia. If we refuse to go or send our children there, we have surrendered to terrorists. Our presence, our voices are essential for a vigorous democracy. We must not withdraw.

It's no longer 1952, but...

Is anti-Semitism in Canada on the rise? Is it our fault? Israel's fault? Nobody's fault?

Recent statistics undoubtedly indicate a loosening in the strictures of civilized behaviours toward our community: synagogues and cemeteries vandalized, graffiti and spoken slurs, statements by church leaders and by politicians such as NDP MP Svend Robinson about the brutality of Israelis and quiet from those same people and many others about the planned and celebrated murders of Jewish men, women and children, to mention a few. The Sept. 9, 2002 riot at Concordia University and subsequent ban on the university's Hillel brings to mind many earlier, uglier incidents in Quebec.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

On the national scene, the Lebanese ambassador to Canada is mouthing canards about Zionist control of the media and the Canadian government, charges that so far have been met with ineffectual responses by that same government. And Canada abstains on motions at the UN specifically aimed at Israel.

Still, I think we need to take a more nuanced approach than we have been. There have been some terrible lapses by people such as native leader David Ahenakew, who made a slew of anti-Semitic comments last December to a reporter in Saskatoon. The conflict at Concordia highlights the resurgence on campuses of a wave of ugly anti-Israel activity, one I've experienced firsthand. On-campus hatred is not new, nor will it go away. In the 1980s, my daughter had to walk down the hall of her residence every day at the University of Toronto past a door plastered with anti-Israeli cartoons (the occupant was the daughter of a U of T professor).

But let's take a deep breath before we ignite.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien has been terribly derelict in his duty. He needed to say at the first incident that attacks on visible Jewish landmarks are abhorrent. He should have been at each synagogue, in each community, the day after each incident. But he wasn't, not because he hates Jews, but because he doesn't see these events as a problem. He might be dim, but he is no anti-Semite.

We have to remember the bad old days here in Canada, chronicled with great acumen by Morton Weinfeld in his book Like Everyone Else, But Different, in which he carefully untangles the mixture of nativism, religious bigotry and Jew-hatred that wracked Canada until well after World War II.

But this is not 1952. There are anti-Semites on campus, but there are also Jewish professors. There may be doctors who find us nasty, but Jews can now enter any medical school they wish, and our community has served the country's medical, legal, scientific, labour and industrial sectors well since quotas and other barriers fell.

Unlike Europe before Adolf Hitler, we do not have parties that run on anti-Semitic platforms, as did Germany, Austria, France and others. The Catholic church has also changed. Pope Pius XII may eventually become a saint (I hope not), but now everyone knows what he did to contribute to the destruction of European Jewry. Successive popes have taken a much different path.

So let us take all this into account when looking at the current situation.

What we have is a low, slow simmering stew of attitudes that coalesce and bubble up, wounding us because we expected better of Canada. We have a national broadcasting company that refuses to acknowledge Palestinian terror, which is not doing the Palestinians any favour, because unless they see themselves reflected in the West's eyes as continuing on a self-destructive track, they won't change. Is this anti-Semitism? Some days, it comes mighty close.

We have members of government who care deeply about the way we feel, but most who are indifferent. That hurts.

We have people, whether they are on the right or left, who rejoice in using the Mideast as the latest weapon against us – verbally and sometimes physically. We have every right to defend ourselves against them using all legal means at our disposal.

However, I don't think the Cossacks are at the shtetl gates.

Still, we could use official help, to reaffirm to our community and to the rest of Canada that there is no room in Canadian society for vandals or bigots, and that they will be punished at the ballot box or in a court of justice. I want to hear our prime minister and every government official speaking now and speaking loudly, to affirm that slurs against the Jews are an insult to all Canadians. I want that message repeated until the Arab ambassadors hear it, and most importantly, Canadians hear it. That's the measure of my anxiety about anti-Semitism in Canada.

Get me to the shul on time

As a teenager, I went to daily morning services for a long stretch. I liked the service, and the shammas at Beth Israel in north Winnipeg used to give me a shot of rye before one of the other minyannaires drove me to school. My grades suffered for awhile, but I was performing a mitzvah and developing a tolerance for Crown Royal that served me well as a university student a few years later.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

I went to synagogue many Saturdays, too. But in my later teen years and into my early 20s, I started to value shluf over shul. My attendance became sporadic, and then for many years synagogue attendance was off my radar altogether. I still went for the High Holy Days, of course, but I had fallen way out of the habit of weekly attendance.

Now, in my late 30s, I'm finding that synagogue attendance is playing a meaningful role in my life again. My wife, kids and I now go to shul most Saturdays armed with snacks, books and toys for the kids. For the last few weeks, I've been trying to figure out what it is exactly that I find so rewarding about the experience. We're not particularly observant, we never arrive at services early enough to feel fully absorbed, and keeping almost-two-year-old Noah happy and busy during the dvar Torah and davening takes some effort (and about a thousand pretzels).

So what is it that attracts us? On a very basic level, it's a break from the pressures of daily life. No phone. No fax. No e-mail. No paperwork. It's the fact that our almost-four-year-old daughter Cari can go to a program in the shul basement with other kids. It's the fact that there's a kiddush and we don't have to clean up.

On a deeper level, the weekly experience helps my wife and me create Jewish memories and experiences for our children. Cari is catching on to some of the tunes and when she and the other tots come up from their program to join in the kiddush and the close of the service, her face lights up. And when Noah sees Cari enter the sanctuary, he jumps and waves excitedly. Not so much because he loves his sister, but in a Pavlovian way, he knows that when Cari and the other kids arrive, he knows he's about to get a chunk of challah.

And while Noah is still at the stage where he is likely to offer the Torah a raisin as it passes by, he becomes more comfortable in the physical space week after week. (Perhaps a little too comfortable. Last shabbat I turned my head for one second during kiddush and he somehow made his way to window shop at the gift shop.)

Shul also offers that rare licence to relax. Praying well requires some effort, of course, but shul permits – indeed, it almost demands – that you turn your attention away from the mundane stresses of daily life. Shabbat and shul allow you to let go, unwind and slow down. And while a good service is usually characterized by a great degree of participation, shul also allows you to enjoy your own silence, either during prayer, while listening to a dvar Torah or while letting your mind wander blissfully.

And finally, part of the joy of shul is the sense of community you can feel. Weekly shul attendance allows you to be surrounded by like-minded people looking for the same peace of mind that you are. Perhaps that is the very definition of community.

So shul will remain a highlight of our week for the time being. Cari will don her party shoes and be silly with the other toddlers. Noah will eat scores of crackers and run miles around the lobby and the sanctuary. I'll close my eyes and absorb it all, while trying to figure out where they keep the rye.

The Kirshner File

The Lower East Side and the power of memory

Manhattan's Lower East Side, a warren of dark, crowded streets in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, appears permanently fixed as the epicentre of Jewish memory in America.

No other piece of real estate is so identified with the Jewish experience in the United States as this teeming, colourful neighbourhood, close to the twin towers felled by Arab terrorists on Sept. 11.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As the focal point of American Jewish remembrance, the Lower East Side has been canonized and mythologized in books, movies, television shows, photographs and museum exhibits. In short, it has come to be defined what it is to be Jewish in America.

Hasia Diner, a professor of American Jewish history at New York University, examines its unique status in the consciousness of Jews in a fine book entitled Lower East Side Memories: A Jewish Place In America (Princeton University Press). Scholarly in tone but never condescending, it examines the evolution of the Lower East Side as "an American Jewish sacred place."

For Diner, the Lower East Side is a crucible where Jewish immigrants endured trials – poverty, disease and family discord – and enjoyed their first glimmerings of success.

Here, in this bustling arena of crumbling tenements, canopies of clothes lines and streets brimming with pushcarts, they learned to adapt to a foreign country, a new language and a strange culture before moving on with their children – the fount of their aspirations and dreams – to squeaky clean suburbs.

A bridge between the oppression of Eastern Europe and the freedom of America, New York City was a magnet pulling newly-arrived Jews to its bosom. From 1885 to 1899, 417,000 Jewish immigrants caught their first glimpse of the United States in the port of New York. By contrast, Philadelphia and Baltimore received 36,000 and 20,000 Jews, respectively.

At the turn of the 20th century, the American Jewish Yearbook estimated that, of the 1,058,135 Jews in the United States, some 400,000 lived in the state of New York alone.

Of those living in New York City, the vast majority resided in the Lower East Side, situated in the southerly precincts of the island of Manhattan. To put it another way, five times as many Jews resided on the Lower East Side as in Chicago and Philadelphia.

As Diner observes, the Brooklyn neighbourhood of Brownsville, in the 1920s, was in fact more Jewish, proportionately speaking, than the Lower East Side. Yet the Lower East Side, rather than Brownsville, became a repository of American Jewish memories on a grand scale.

As she puts it, "No other ethnic group in America, with the exception of the African-American construction of Harlem, has so thoroughly understood, imagined and represented itself through a particular chunk of space."

She adds: "No Jewish neighbourhood in Warsaw, Lodz, Vilna, Odessa, Berlin, Budapest or London has approached the Lower East Side in terms of its mythic memorial tenacity."

The reason is clear.

By a twist of fate, the Lower East Side lay smack dab in the middle of New York City, not only the largest metropolis in the United States, but the centre of American culture. Through journalism, photography and motion pictures, the Jews of the Lower East Side would be the most written about and photographed in the history of the Jewish people, with the possible exception of the victims of the Holocaust and contemporary Israeli Jews.

By Diner's estimation, the Lower East Side broke into mainstream American culture with the publication in 1951 of Sydney Taylor's All-of-a-Kind Family, the first commercially published, widely distributed children's book with a Jewish subject.

Fifty years on, it still remains in print.

Published at a moment when U.S. Jews were fleeing to the wide open, treed spaces of the suburbs, it was a landmark in American publishing, presenting ordinary American Jews to the reading public for the first time.

The post-war years also saw the republication of classics set in the Lower East Side: Abraham Cahan's The Rise of David Levinsky (1917), Henry Roth's Call It Sleep (1943) and Anzia Yezierska's Bread Givers (1925).

"They achieved canonical status after their reissues, becoming standard fare for college literature and ethnic studies courses," Diner writes. "Scholars around the world turned to them for access to what they defined as the authentic voices of the immigrant era…"

During the 1970s and 1980s, the Lower East Side "romantic novel" burst upon the scene in novels such as Belva Plain's Evergreen (1978), Gloria Goldreich's Leah's Journey (1978), Meredith Tax's Rivington Street (1982) and its sequel, Union Square (1988). In 1990, Janet Robertson wrote Journey Home, which also reflected peculiarly Jewish and decidedly Lower East Side memories.

I agree with Diner's thesis that no one did more for Lower East Side memory than Irving Howe's The World Of Our Fathers (1976), which appeared in the year of the United States' bicentennial. "Jewish readers embraced the book with passion, whether or not they had plowed through all its 646 pages. In an era when Americans sought to explore their roots, here were theirs uncovered in bold relief."

The Lower East Side, as photographed by Lewis Hine in 1912.

Hollywood's encounter with the Lower East Side originally occurred in the first two decades of the 20th century. Films like Child of the Ghetto (1910), The Heart of a Jewess (1921) and, most important, The Jazz Singer (1927), juxtaposed scenes of the Lower East Side with melodramatic personal stories.

Not to be outdone, Yiddish filmmakers portrayed it in tearjerkers ranging from Uncle Moses (1930) to Two Sisters (1938).

In 1974, Joan Micklin Silver, whose parents had immigrated from Europe and had settled in Kansas City and Omaha, directed a film version of Cahan's short story, Yekl, a Tale of the Ghetto, and called it Hester Street. It was a hit.

Twelve years later, Steven Spielberg, he of Jaws fame, produced An American Tail, a feature-length animated cartoon turning on a lovable rodent named Feival Mouskewitz.

Two years after An American Tail, Spielberg's first foray into a Jewish theme, Micklin Silver was back again on the Lower East Side with Crossing Delancey.

To no one's surprise, the Lower East Side has been and continues to be memorialized by its sumptuous Jewish food.

For close to a century, legendary establishments like Ratner's dairy restaurant on Delancey Street and Yonah Schimmel's Kinshery on Houston Street have dished out mouthwatering meals. And since 1974, Sammy's Roumanian Steak House on Chrystie Street has also traded on the nostalgic past.

Although the Lower East Side is no longer a Jewish enclave, having been "taken over" by non-Jewish immgrants, it still occupies a special niche in the hearts of many Jews.

"That American Jews at the beginning of the twenty first century continue to comb the Lower East Side for hints of who they were, and for hopes that the neigbourhood as a sacred place will help them chart their future, bears witness to the power of memory in shaping identity."

Grade One Class Size
Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
Educators and parents agree that Grade One is the foundation year for learning. In General Studies, some children are already reading, while others are not. In Judaic Studies, all children must learn to read, write, and speak simple Hebrew. To ensure each child's success, Grade One classes have a maximum of 25 children. If a class exceeds 25 children, a fully certified teacher joins the lead teacher for 50% of instructional time in both Judaic and General Studies. Regardless of class size, remedial/resource help is provided as needed. This policy guarantees our children an outstanding Grade One experience.

Book honours righteous Swiss

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Meir Wagner has attended launchings of his new book, The Righteous of Switzerland: Heroes of the Holocaust, in 12 countries around the world in the past two years.

"Not to be there would be like a bridegroom not attending his own wedding," says Wagner, 69, just prior to a recent launch sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and the Consulate General of Switzerland.

He showed pictures of himself with such dignitaries as Queen Elizabeth, former British prime minister Margaret Thatcher, New York Senator Hillary Clinton and author Elie Wiesel, and said his book, which focuses on the righteous Swiss, is of importance to everyone in the world.

Quoting a letter Wiesel sent before the launch, Wagner said the book, which highlights the story of 37 Swiss men and women, is not about Switzerland, but about some of the men and women who, in choosing to save Jewish lives in a time of extreme darkness and death, serve as an example to future generations.

"The question of why there were so few [of them] reverberates in these pages. [The book] also casts a darker shadow on others, who in an atmosphere of complacency or indifference, did little or nothing," Wiesel wrote.

Wagner, who was born in Romania, was deported along with his family to the Ukraine when he was seven. Following liberation and the takeover of his family business by the communist state, he moved to Israel. He later moved to Switzerland with his Swiss-born wife.

He had been planning the book, which took one year to write, for many years. "Switzerland had a bad name for a long time, and I wanted to show that there were also good people, some of whom are still alive," Wagner says.

"You can't say a whole country is bad because of a few crazy people. This is a lesson to the world that people can save others; they can be good."

Wagner, who conducted research at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, the department of history at the University of Zurich and the archives of the International Red Cross in Geneva, said that he still can't "digest" the success of his book.

Meir Wagner

"I [thought] a few people would learn the story, but response from the book came in like a flood. It has been successful because it preaches for tolerance and shows that it is important to do good things for humanity."

People need to read positive stories, he said, "especially at a time when the world has become vulgar, when the world has become more violent than ever before."

At the launch, Urs Ziswiler, the ambassador of Switzerland to Canada, said, "Switzerland at that time certainly committed important errors which it is necessary to admit without ambiguity. Shameful actions are acknowledged today.

"We also know that, in the economic sphere, transactions took place which probably went beyond the scope of commercial relations crucial for the survival of our population.

"However, there is always good, even in the darkest of times, and Meir Wagner's book focuses on those righteous Swiss."

New cantor bound to congregants through music

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

To Gershon Silins, newly installed cantor at Temple Sinai, music is the tie that binds.

"There are times during a service when I feel bound with the congregants; I feel as if we are one entity," he says.

Silins, 52, who comes to the temple from Beth Emet The Free Synagogue in Evanston, Ill., and Temple Emanuel in Kensington, Md., where he served until 2001, has been singing for as long as he can remember.

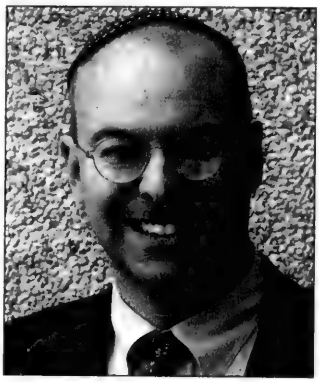
Coming to Temple Sinai, he says, is like coming home. "It's difficult to say, in a few words, everything that is good about the congregation.

"Musically, the most amazing feature is having Ben Steinberg as composer in residence. He's known as the dean of North American Jewish composers, and the amount of influence he has on our musical standards is remarkable."

For many people, he says, music is a major feature of a religious service. "The character of Jewish music is what makes us unique.

"At a service, congregants need to listen, sing and pray. These are irreplaceable elements. If I get up there and feel like a performer, something in the service is missing.

"There are moments at a service when I feel as if we are doing something together that is larger than any one of us could do individually."



Gershon Silins

As cantor, Silins' duties include leading services, working with bar/bat mitzvah students, conducting the junior choir, supervising two adult choirs and getting involved with adult education.

He plans no changes for the first little while because "it's the time now for me to figure out what Temple Sinai is all about. It's not up to me to change anything just yet."

Silins began singing in synagogue choirs and went on to become a concert and opera singer. He has appeared with, among others, the Chicago Symphony and the Brooklyn Philharmonic orchestras, as well as with Chicago's Music of the Baroque Chorus and the New York Choral Artists.

In Israel, he has sung at the Jerusalem Theatre and has presented a recital at the Zionist Confederation House.

He has served on the board of the American Conference of Cantors, and on the Commission on Synagogue Music of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

It was in his 30s, he says, that he joined the Kane Street Synagogue in Brooklyn, N.Y., and became interested in singing Jewish music.

"I discovered I enjoyed attending services; it felt good when I went every week. Eventually, I realized I wanted to pursue a cantorial career and enrolled at Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion, School of Sacred Music. It was the smartest thing I ever did."

As a Chicago native, coming to Canada has been a great adventure for him, he says. "I discovered I love the Canadian scene. There is a social responsibility here that is higher than in the United States, and I like to be part of it. I have visited here before, but I never thought it would be possible to live here.

"I knew I was living and working in the right place when a passenger on a plane asked me where I came from and I replied, 'Toronto is home.'"

Baranovski murder case resumes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The first phase of the murder trial of Daniel Weiz and two youths charged in the beating death of Matti Baranovski got under way earlier this week with the court considering preliminary legal motions.

Jury selection is scheduled to take place Feb. 3 and trial on the evidence will begin Feb. 24.

The trial is expected to take several months.

On Nov. 14, 1999, Baranovski was with a group of friends in G. Ross Lord Park in North York when he was beaten to death by a gang of masked youths.

Weiz, a native of Israel, was living with his father in Toronto at the time. He returned to Israel a week after Baranovski's death and subsequently fought Canada's request to extradite him, taking his case to the Israeli Supreme Court. The court allowed the extradition and Weiz was brought to Toronto in October 2000. The preliminary inquiry began in July 2001 and in March 2002, an Ontario judge ruled the Crown had presented sufficient evidence to warrant a trial of the three suspects on second degree murder charges.

"How I lost 76 lbs. — effortlessly!"

My name is Tania Olsson. I am a customer service representative. I dropped 76 lbs. of fat in 13 short months. My story is so remarkable. I would like to share it with you. — Tania Olsson

"I was shocked when I saw my family video. How did I get so fat?"
Tania Olsson before shedding 76 lbs.

My cheeks burned with embarrassment as I stared at the television screen. We were watching a recent family video. "I'm huge!" I gasped.

I was shocked and appalled to realize how fat I had become.

My weight made me crazy. I refused to eat in public. I knew what people were thinking....Look at what you're eating...no wonder you're so fat. Go ahead, have another cheeseburger, honey.

Dieting Nightmares. I was always trying the next fad diet. When I didn't feel the results, I'd get discouraged. The cravings were unbearable. Nothing I do works, I told myself as I sat on the couch with a gallon of ice cream. What's the use of trying?

Ray of Sunshine. One day a close friend encouraged me to try hypnosis. I was skeptical. "I've heard they get great results," she said. I could only hope.

The free weight loss consultation was like a ray of sunshine. My consultant was caring and concerned. They explained the program in detail. Left it for me to decide. The fee was much lower than I expected.

I signed up and lost 76 lbs. in 13 short months. I lost ten inches off my waist. My dress size plunged from a bulging 22 to a sleek size 8.

Whole New Me! Immediately after my first session my appetite diminished. I feel completely satisfied with small, healthy portions. I know I will never, ever gain the weight back. Now that I'm thin and happy with my body, I can't think of a single reason to overeat.

Hypnosis Delivers Benefits!

I used to feel sluggish by 9:00 a.m. I was so depressed. Even my hair drooped.

"You can lose weight – because I did!"
Tania Olsson After Hypnosis

Since hypnosis I look and feel young, alive and vibrant. My skin is glowing. My hair is thick and shiny. I have tons of energy. I'm light on my feet.

Shopping for a size 8 is the most wonderful feeling in the world. I no longer worry about eating in public. When eyes are on me, I know they're thinking, "Hey, she's got it together."

Recommends. I suffered when I was overweight. I lived in a state of overwhelming helplessness. I was out of control. It was frightening.

I got more than I expected from my private hypnosis sessions.

I feel wonderful about myself. If it wasn't for hypnosis I would not be enjoying my slim, healthy body today.

My only regret is that I waited and suffered for months. You don't have to suffer another second. Call right now to schedule your free weight loss consultation. I know your consultant will answer all your questions and put your fears to rest. If they don't think hypnosis is right for you, they will tell you so. You owe it to yourself to find out. CALL NOW!

Educator honoured for 30-year career at Eitz Chaim

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Solomon Jakobovits, who was recently honoured by the Board of Jewish Education for his 30-year career at Eitz Chaim Schools, has received many accolades over his career as an educator and school principal.

But there's one he's especially proud of.

In 1988, a Los Angeles Jewish newspaper editorial began with the statement, "The best teacher I ever had was Rabbi Solomon Jakobovits..."

The article went on to describe a Talmud class in which Rabbi Jakobovits used a personal experience to explain why the rabbis allowed a sukkah to be as small as seven handbreadths by seven handbreadths (24 inches by 24 inches).

During his childhood in Berlin, the rule allowed Rabbi Jakobovits' father to build a little "doll sukkah" on their balcony in 1938 without "the German hooligans seeing it from below," he explained.

"My father could fulfil the mitzvah of building a sukkah without putting the family into too much danger."

Rabbi Solomon Jakobovits

Fourteen years later, that classroom lesson was retold by Rabbi Paysach J. Krohn in his book Reflections of the Maggid as an example of parental education.

Rabbi Krohn used the anecdote to illustrate the relation between the sacrifices parents make to fulfill mitzvot and the subsequent level of adherence by their children.

Soon after the sukkah-building event, the Jakobovits family moved to Windsor, England, and the eight children grew up to become rabbis, doctors, lawyers, educators and mothers. One of the brothers, Lord Immanuel Jakobovits, was Britain's chief rabbi from 1967 to 1991 – the only one to be knighted and elevated to the House of Lords – before he died in November 1999.

Rabbi Solomon Jakobovits' career in education took him to Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1960, where he became assistant principal of Hillel Academy. He taught math, science, history and Talmud there until 1962 when he moved to Toronto.

For Rabbi Jakobovits, the lives of the Talmud students he taught in Pittsburgh exemplify the power of successful teaching and the ability of a good lesson to stay with students long after the class is over.

"Students respond to strong leadership, good lessons and personal attention," Rabbi Jakobovits said.

"I have tried to imbue my teachers with the notion that you control the class by making it interesting... and by never using punishment – no lines, no standing in the corner and no going to the principal," said the rabbi, who retired last year from his post as general studies principal at Eitz Chaim, a post that he held on and off for 30 years.

The single most important contribution the rabbi believes he has made to Eitz Chaim was establishing a school in 1963 at the corner of Bathurst Street and Patricia Avenue, even though the Board of Jewish Education was not convinced at that time it was appropriate to move from its location on Darcy Avenue.

"I opened with a kindergarten and a nursery school... We put a wooden structure on that land and opened up three classrooms and the B'nai Torah Synagogue," the rabbi recalled.

A lot has changed since then, he said: the school has moved and parents' attitudes have evolved.

"Back then, parents supported the teacher. Now, parents are more likely to support their child, which makes it more challenging for teachers today," he said.

One of the most important tasks for a principal is to pursue an effective method for choosing and monitoring staff, Rabbi Jakobovits said.

But over the years, Rabbi Jacobovits has found that, above all, a principal should not give in lightly to changes in curriculum.

He said he has always preferred traditional approaches to teaching, such as retaining separate history and geography classes instead of blending the two subjects together into a social studies class.

Eventually, he said, such trends dissipate and "educators come around" to his point of view.

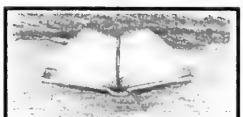
HaShem invites us to be partners

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS



Rabbinic Reflections

The Haftorah accompanying Parshat Yitro and the giving of the Torah is one of the great visions of the prophet Isaiah and has a powerful message as to the greatness and humility of human beings.

When we address our Creator, how are we to appear? Are we a nothing, a piece of dust in His Presence – in which case we should lie flat on our faces, as nothings in the face of the Almighty. Or perhaps we are full of trembling and awe, bent over in submission before Him – in which case we should kneel or bow low in approaching the Almighty. Yet we do neither of these in our main prayer, the Amidah. Our main prayer of the traditional service is said standing tall – albeit with four brief bows, but nonetheless we stand tall, not flat on our face, nor kneeling or bowed over.

Isaiah conveys these very sentiments in our Haftorah. In the great vision in the sixth chapter of Isaiah, the prophet describes seeing a huge chamber with the Creator sitting on a great throne. Angels are flying around, six winged angels, calling one to another, "Holy, Holy, Holy" with such a loud voice that the entire chamber shakes.

Isaiah, seeing this vision of the heavenly beings, says to himself, "Oy to me," I am a nothing amongst a people of impurity. An angel takes a coal, brings it to Isaiah's lips, and says, "All your sins have been removed." The Lord asks who He should send to the Jewish people, to which Isaiah answers, "Send me."

Are we a nothing? Yes. Does Isaiah feel totally inadequate? Yes. Are we dust and ash in the face of the Almighty? Yes. In our prayers, we reflect this need for humility in the face of the Creator – we bow, and on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, even right down to the ground.

However, if the Almighty is inviting us into His presence, I guess we are not nothings. He does not choose to ignore us. He initiates the contact. He wants to send a prophet to speak to the Jewish people. Well, if that is the case, in spite of all of our failings, we must be OK. In fact, more than OK – we are His partners. He wants us. So, after his sins have been removed, Isaiah answers, "Here I am."

We all have our failings, our shortcomings, our inadequacies. The Master of the universe is not looking for perfect people – He is looking for willing partners. He invites us into His presence.

Isaiah paints the picture of the meekness of man, of our great inadequacy, of our nothingness in the face of the Creator. And at the same time, he shows us the reach of the Master of the universe to man and the desire of mortal man to take His hand, even with all of our failings.

So for our main prayer, the Amidah, we stand in front of HaShem. We aren't perfect, but we are partners.

Goldhagen's latest stirs more controversy

A Moral Reckoning, The Role of the Catholic Church in the Holocaust and its Unfulfilled Duty of Repair*, by Daniel Jonah Goldhagen, Random House, 2002, $38.00

Books
Bernard Baskin

In 1996, Daniel Goldhagen's book Hitler's Willing Executioners – a fierce, blanket indictment of German society during the Holocaust – provoked a moral uproar. Critics objected that his condemnation went too far, saying it didn't allow for the dissent and opposition that existed among many Germans against Hitler and his ruthless regime.

Goldhagen's new book – a penetrating inquiry into the role of the Catholic Church in the Holocaust – has encountered similar controversy.

He argues that much of Church doctrine provided justification for Nazi genocide. He writes, "After all priests had been preaching that the Jews were the tainted murderers of Christ and 'an insufferable devilish burden,' and few earlier bloodlettings had been without the blessings of popes and prelates; small wonder, then, that although German bishops protested the state's euthanasia program against the ill and infirm, they never publicly spoke against the elimination of their Jewish compatriots."

Goldhagen sheds particularly harsh light on Pope Pius XII, who suppressed his immediate predecessor's encyclical condemning Nazi anti-Semitism and professed a "special love" for Germany as against a special hatred for the godless Bolshevism that he suspected the Jews of spreading. Pius, he adds, knew all about the gas chambers and yet lent the Church's support to Italy's consent to the deportation of its own Jewish population as late as 1943.

Once again, critics are insisting that Goldhagen's account is extreme and one-sided. Pius XII, elected pope in 1939, was not the monster that Goldhagen portrays, but a weak, indecisive, fearful figure in the wrong position at the wrong time. Perhaps, they argue, Pius XII halted an encyclical that would have condemned anti-Semitism because he knew that Hitler, a Catholic apostate, had threatened similar attacks against German Catholics.

Part of the problem may also have been that Pius XII (who had lived for years in Germany as a Vatican diplomat) looked upon German National Socialism as the devil that he knew – compared to the anti-religious mania of Stalin's Communism. Once World War II began, Pius's refusal to aid Catholics helping Jews escape persecution and his silence about Nazi depravities were, in fact, mistaken but understandable attempts to maintain Vatican neutrality and to control a church rife with virulent anti-Semites.

In a recent review of the book, Michael Marrus, dean of the graduate studies at the University of Toronto, writes of Goldhagen's "utter incapability of nuance, his refusal to accept that there is any ambiguity whatever in the evidence he cites or the situations he describes. Whether in reference to Pius's purported anti-Semitism or the Vatican's wartime diplomacy or the actions of church leaders... Goldhagen sees every instance in black and white, and never shades of grey. In that sense, and in his highly selective reading of the available documentation, he is the mirror image of the apologists for Pius XII, those who are stridently promoting [his] candidacy for sainthood."

A section of Goldhagen's book insists that the Church must acknowledge its complicity in the Holocaust if it is to undo the harm it has produced. It must work assiduously to combat, to reduce, and to teach people the falseness and, in its terms, the sinfulness of anti-Semitism – a hateful doctrine whose origins lie in New Testament passages that depict Jews as "a brood of vipers" and worse.

The author makes the suggestion, hardly likely to be followed, that every Christian Bible print a clear disclaimer alongside the text that some passages once presented as fact are actually false or dubious and the source of much unjust injury.

Passionately written, meticulously researched, wide-sweeping and endlessly opinionated and controversial, A Moral Reckoning deserves to be widely read and debated.

Israel quietly played big role in Gulf War

MYTH:

Israel's low profile in the 1991 Gulf War proves it has no strategic value to the United States.

FACT:

Israel was never expected to play a major role in hostilities in the Gulf. American officials knew the Arabs would not allow Israel to help defend them; they also knew U.S. troops would have to intervene because the Gulf states could not protect themselves.

Israel's posture reflected a deliberate political decision in response to American requests. Nevertheless, it did aid the United States' successful campaign to roll back Iraq's aggression. For example:

• The Israel Defence Forces was the sole military force in the region that could successfully challenge the Iraqi army. That fact, which Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein understood, was a deterrent to further Iraqi aggression.

• By warning that it would take military measures if any Iraqi troops entered Jordan, Israel in effect guaranteed its neighbour's territorial integrity against Iraqi aggression.

• The United States benefited from the use of Israeli-made Have Nap air-launched missiles on its B-52 bombers. The Navy, meanwhile, used Israeli Pioneer pilotless drones for reconnaissance in the Gulf.

• Israel provided mine plows that were used to clear paths for Allied forces through Iraqi minefields.

• Mobile bridges flown directly from Israel to Saudi Arabia were employed by the U.S. Marine Corps.

• Israeli recommendations, based upon system performance observations, led to several software changes that made the Patriot a more capable missile defence system.

• Israel Aircraft Industries developed conformal fuel tanks that enhanced the range of F-15 aircraft. These were used in the Gulf.

• General Dynamics, a U.S. military contractor, has implemented a variety of Israeli modifications to improve the worldwide F-16 aircraft fleet, including structural enhancements, software changes, increased capability landing gear, radio improvements and avionic modifications.

• An Israeli-produced targeting system was used to increase the Cobra helicopter's night-fighting capabilities.

• Israel manufactured the canister for the highly successful Tomahawk missile.

• Night-vision goggles used by U.S. forces were supplied by Israel.

• A low-altitude warning system produced and developed in Israel was utilized on Blackhawk helicopters.

• Israel provided other equipment to U.S. forces, including flak vests, gas masks and sandbags.

• Israel offered the United States the use of military and hospital facilities. U.S. ships utilized Haifa port shipyard maintenance and support on their way to the Gulf.

• Israel destroyed Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981. Consequently, U.S. troops did not face a nuclear-armed Iraq.

• Israel's military intelligence had focused on Iraq much more carefully over the years than had the U.S. intelligence community. Thus, the Israelis were able to provide Washington with detailed tactical intelligence on Iraqi military activities. Then-U.S. defence secretary Richard Cheney said, for example, that the United States utilized Israeli information about western Iraq in its search for Scud missile launchers.

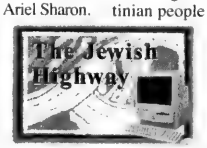
Israeli elections – part 4

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In a few days, Israelis will go the polls to choose their next government and prime minister. Today, we conclude our look at the official party Web sites and sites for Amram Mitzna and Ariel Sharon. All sites offer English content except where indicated. Please note that this is not an exhaustive look at all the parties running in the election, since several parties, including the National Religious Party, Za'am and Men's Rights in Family do not operate sites.



Yisrael Aheret (Different Israel) is appealing to young voters who "have decided to take responsibility in building a future for the country… Israel is the place for people who believe that it is possible." [http://www.disrael.co.il/] The party wants to raise the electoral threshold from 1.5 per cent to five per cent and has said its MKs wouldn't serve as ministers but would appoint professionals instead. [http://info.jpost.com/ C002/Supplements/Elections2003/pp_different.html]

There are several parties that target Arab voters. The ODA, the Organization for Democratic Action, under Asma Agbariya seeks "to advance a new alternative that will replace (1) the do-nothing Arab leadership inside Israel, (2) the Palestinian Authority (PA), which has integrated the Palestinian national movement into the American system, and (3) the Islamic current, which seeks to lead the Arab masses toward a dead end of otherworldly extremism." [http:// www.odaction.org/]

Under its leader Mohammed Barakeh, Hadash – The Democratic Front for Peace and Equality, calls for the "evacuation of all the settlements and Israeli withdrawal from all the Palestinian territories conquered in the June 1967 war… and recognition of the right of the Palestinian people to establish its own independent and sovereign state in the territories alongside the State of Israel." [http://www.hadash. org.il/english/]

Azmi Bishara is the leader of Balad – The National Democratic Assembly. In an interview posted on his Web site, the MK says Jews should "free themselves of this strange story called Zionism… What becomes apparent is that the movement essentially failed to achieve the two main objectives it set for itself: leaving the ghetto and being a nation like all others." [http:// makeashorterlink.com/?C54A21013] Israel's Central Election Committee had ruled that Bishara and Ahmed Tibi of the Hadash slate could not run for election because they supported armed struggle against Israel. Bishara and Tibi challenged the ruling to the Supreme Court which sided with the candidates. [http:// makeashorterlink.com/?I26A42013]

The Tzomet party Web site had been working but was not operational in mid-January. The party under the leadership of Moshe Green was established in the early '80s in opposition to the withdrawal from Sinai. [http://planet.nana. co.il /zomet/]

If you still crave more information about the election and can read Hebrew on your browser, I highly recommend the Politika Achshav – Politics Now site. Not only is this site full of information but it also has hilarious mock ads which may deflate a few of the country's political egos. [http://politicsnow.co.il] (Thanks to Dr. Morton Silverberg for tipping me off about this site.)

Finally, here's how you can learn more about the men vying to lead the country. The Prime Minister's Office has a biography of Ariel Sharon, as well as dozens of Sharon's speeches dating back to his inauguration in March 2001. [http://www.pmo.gov.il/english/] The Likud site has more on its leader along with the party's television ads, featuring the leader. [http://www.likud.org.il]

You can find background in Hebrew about Amram Mitzna at the Labor Web site [http://aavoda.co.il] and at Mitzna's official site, designed when he was vying for the leadership of the Labor party. [http://www.mitzna.co.il]. You can read a recent feature interview with Mitzna at the Jerusalem Post site. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?O25613013]

And what about the footsteps that one of these two candidates will have to walk in? The Prime Ministers of Israel page has biographies of all 11 Israeli PMs. [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/ mfa/go.asp?MFAH00k60]. Study well. Because when you're done, you can test your knowledge at the Israeli Prime Ministers Game [http://www.bus.ual berta.ca/yreshef/zionism/pmgame/pmgame.html Match up a historical fact while clicking on the picture of a Prime Minister and the computer will tell you in a perfect Hebrew accent whether your choice is nachon (correct) or lo nachon (incorrect.)

Concordia erred in the Netanyahu fiasco: Rector

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Concordia University says it made a mistake in not heeding its security director's advice that a speech by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu should not take place at the downtown campus, but rather at the Loyola campus or off-site entirely.

Rector Frederick Lowy admitted at a press conference last week the university was not adequately prepared from a security point of view to stage the event at the main downtown campus, despite extensive planning with police.

In releasing the university's final report on the events leading to the cancellation of Netanyahu's appearance Sept. 9, Lowy said: "We recognize that we should not have held the event at the Hall building on that day or that we should have hosted it at the Loyola campus as we had suggested to the event organizers early in the planning process...

'Event should not have been downtown'

"Objectively, we erred on this level, and accept responsibility for effectively putting some of our students, faculty and staff in danger that day. That should not have happened and will not happen again."

Netanyahu was invited by Hillel and his Canadian visit was sponsored by the Asper Foundation. The university called off the event after a protest against him by more than 1,000 people turned violent.

The report, prepared by Susan Magor, Concordia's director of environmental health and safety, reveals that an assessment in early August by security director Jean Brisebois recommended that the administration look for other venues because of the potential for problems.

Brisebois made the evaluation with help from Montreal police and the RCMP.

Brisebois said the 675-seat Hall auditorium has "limited escape routes" in the event of emergencies and noted that the Hall building "symbolizes 'Ground Zero' for polarized pro-Palestinian and pro-Israeli student activists," and was the site of a speech on the Mideast by Alan Baker of the Israeli foreign ministry in January 2001 that came close to violence.

Brisebois also warned that Sept. 9 fell during student orientation week, when large crowds would be in the building and was just two days before the first anniversary of 9/11.

But the report said organizers of the Netanyahu event did not accept any of the alternative locations proposed by Concordia.

In mid-August, the administration asked Brisebois to make a second assessment in light of new information, including police intelligence that "external elements" were not expected to take part in the protest and that the Concordia Student Union and other student groups had assured it the demonstration would be peaceful.

The fact that 16 other non-violent protests related to the Arab-Israeli conflict had taken place in Montreal during the previous 12 months was also a factor in the administration's decision to allow the event to go ahead in the Hall building. A security plan was then devised with the Montreal police and RCMP.

Close to 100 police were deployed on Sept. 9, in addition to university security staff.

"While protest was anticipated and planned for, we did not expect a concerted, planned attempt to stop the event by any means possible, including violence," Lowy said, adding the possibility was "contrary to all the advance intelligence that municipal and federal police forces were able to provide us."

While Lowy said the administration did not expect the violence, its report on the incident says at least two unions advised their members to stay away from work Sept. 9 because of safety concerns.

The report notes that Lowy and his top administrators were away on a retreat from Sept. 3 to Sept. 5, but Lowy told reporters he did not believe this had any bearing on planning for the event, because most measures were already in place by then.

Lowy placed most of the blame for what happened on those who organized the violence and encouraged others to participate.

"They, and nobody else, created a potentially tragic situation and risked not only their own security but also that of many innocent bystanders and guests who were trying to attend the event," he said.

(Five people were arrested – including two Concordia students – and disciplinary hearings against 11 students charged with breaking the university's regulations are to begin this week.)

Lowy also announced a shake-up in the university's administration aimed at cooling tensions on campus.

The resignation of Donald Boisvert, dean of students for the past 15 years, who tried with little success to reconcile pro-Palestinian and pro-Israel students, has been accepted, although Lowy insisted he was not the fall guy in this controversy.

Boisvert is expected to return to teaching at Concordia in the autumn.

Charles Bertrand, a retired history professor who was interim rector in 1994-95, has been named interim dean of students and associate vice-rector of student life.

Patricia Gabel, an expert in conflict resolution and international law, has been appointed to the new post of special advisor to the rector on conflict analysis and management. Most recently, she was a fellow at Harvard University's Weatherhead Centre for International Affairs.

She will look into setting up the Concordia Centre for International and Cross-Cultural Dispute Resolution.

Peter Côté, a university chaplain, became interim advisor on rights and responsibilities last month. He is charged with administering Concordia's code on standards of conduct on campus.

Queen's University Hillel proposes open letter to CSU

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The student government of Queen's University is considering a proposal by its campus Hillel to issue an open letter to the Concordia Student Union (CSU) defending the rights of all student groups and addressing the CSU's actions toward Concordia Hillel late last year.

In early December, the Montreal university's student union suspended Hillel's funding and its right to hold activities on campus for distributing flyers about Mahal, a program that allows young Jews from abroad to serve in the Israel Defence Forces for 18 months. Hillel's right to use university space for its activities was re-instituted Dec. 12, but funding remains frozen.

'We wanted to express support'

The executive of Queen's Hillel made its proposal at an Alma Mater Society (AMS) meeting two weeks ago, asking the group to issue a letter emphasizing its commitment to freedom of speech, religion and association for all student groups in Canada, and calling for the reinstatement of Concordia Hillel's funding as well as for an apology by CSU executive for its treatment of Concordia Hillel and the campus' Jewish community.

The idea came up in e-mail correspondence among members of the Queen's Hillel executive during December exams, Hillel president Deborah Zuker told The CJN in a phone interview from the Kingston, Ont., campus.

"We wanted to express support [for Concordia Hillel]," she said.

Hillel's political advocacy chair, Mike Saposnik, met with Zuker, Lindsay and Kaufman after the AMS meeting to make suggestions for the letter.

Also following the AMS meeting, AMS vice-president Shawna Kaufman and president Mike Lindsay were quoted in the campus newspaper, the Queen's Journal, as saying they needed more information before taking action.

"If this is going on at Concordia, we have a right and an obligation to get involved, but we don't know for sure what's going on... and we need to get to the bottom of what's going on," Lindsay wrote.

Kaufman, who said the language in the suggestions may have been too strong, is working on a report for this week's AMS meeting.

Meanwhile, Saposnik has drafted some revised suggestions that Zuker hopes will be approved.

"It's worded more in terms of future behaviour and upholding of principles of freedom of speech," she said. "It's more future-oriented in order to avoid unduly passing judgment."

Queen's itself has a "pretty friendly" atmosphere, said Zuker, although pro-Palestinian/anti-Israel sentiment is "growing a little bit."

She said she feels comfortable as a Jewish student and has not heard from any of the estimated 400 to 500 Jewish students that they feel otherwise.

"We have a pretty active, thriving Hillel community," she said.

The Jewish student organization has about 130 paid members and about 250 on its e-mail list.

'Clear guidelines' for behaviour to be established

Another step outlined by Lowy that is intended to "ensure a safe, secure and non-intimidating environment" and foster civil debate is the drawing up of "clear guidelines" on what constitutes "crossing the line" behaviour, which he did not define.

He said he expects these criteria and the sanctions for not meeting them will be established within "a few weeks."

Lowy said the university also intends to clarify what types of posters and publications are acceptable, and how university space may be used. It has already been decided that the Hall building will "for the time being" no longer be used for events judged to be high risk.

Lowy also said invitations to controversial speakers will be evaluated by the administration in future, a reversal of the university's history of never having refused a speaker invited by students.

Without being more specific, Lowy said a "monitoring system" will be put in place to enforce the new policies. He stressed Concordia wishes to maintain its tradition of unfettered expression, but not if it leads to intimidation or harassment.

He said the administration itself plans to sponsor an academic lecture series on Mideast-related issues, directed by a committee of students and faculty members and chaired by Elizabeth Sacca, dean of graduate studies.

Lowy said this will serve as a "model" for students on how those who disagree can engage each other in "a civil and respectful fashion."

And the Lord said, "Thou Shalt Attend."

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 30th, 2003.

Press U.S. to stop funding Israeli military: McDonough

Canada should pressure the United States to stop funding Israel's "military heavy-handedness" against the Palestinians, outgoing NDP leader Alexa McDonough said last week.

McDonough, who is also her party's critic on the Middle East, made the comments in Jerusalem at the end of a 16-day, five-member peace mission by the party to Israel, Jordan, the West Bank and Gaza.

"People are desperate to see Canada take more responsibility to pressure our American neighbours to stop bankrolling the military heavy-handedness here," she told the Toronto Star.

"Canada needs to be far more vocal in efforts to try to persuade the Israeli government that in the name of fighting terrorism and seeking security you can't trample human rights, human lives and human dignity. You contribute not to security, but to an escalation of violence that fuels terrorism."

In a statement released on behalf of the mission, McDonough said Israelis and Palestinians "must be brought back to the negotiating table and international peacekeepers must be present to reduce the violence that has [both sides] living in a state of perpetual fear and insecurity.

"Canada is uniquely situated to play a key role in bringing this about."

She said both sides have valid grievances regarding each other's actions in the ongoing conflict.

"It is clear that Israelis will never succumb to the blackmail of suicide bombings, nor should they. It is equally clear that Palestinians will not be humiliated or intimidated into giving up their claim to a sovereign state, nor should they. The vicious cycle of civilian attacks and collective punishment will not end of its own accord."

Canadian Jewish Congress President Keith Landy said McDonough's comments "show why the NDP is so marginalized within the Jewish community."

He said her suggestion the conflict will be solved by cutting U.S. funding to Israel "displays a real lack of understanding" of the Mideast crisis.

"There's nothing wrong with the NDP calling for a de-escalation of the situation," Landy said, but the party's "moral equivalency argument... fails to take into account that it is up to the Palestinian leadership to rein in terror and the killing of innocents."

The NDP mission included peace activist Carolyn Pogue, former MP David MacDonald, journalist David Berlin and Rev. Bill Phipps, head of the group Religions for Peace.

Graham accepts apology from Lebanese ambassador

OTTAWA — Foreign Affairs Minister Bill Graham accepted an apology from Lebanon's ambassador to Canada last week for controversial comments about Canada's decision to ban Hezbollah and said he considers the matter closed.

Raymond Baaklini was called to a personal meeting with Graham last Thursday to be told his recent public statements about Jewish influence in Canada were unacceptable.

Ottawa had faced growing pressure from Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith and Israel Asper, head of CanWest Global Communications, which owns the National Post and other media outlets, to revoke Baaklini's diplomatic credentials after he told the Montreal-based newspaper Sada al Machric that Canada added Hezbollah to its list of banned terror groups because of pressure from a "Zionist party" that "controls 90 per cent of the Canadian media."

In a letter "confirming" what he told Graham in person, Baaklini said that "like Canada, Lebanon is a multicultural country of very diverse traditions that respects Judaism, as it does Islam and Christianity, as part of our culture."

He added: "I regret that my comments caused offence and that they created a controversy."

But the letter did not retract the statement about Zionist influence of the media and it was unclear if the issue was addressed in person with Graham.

"[Baaklini] has once again refused to retract his ugly remarks, which are so reflective of the endemic anti-Semitism in the official Arab world," CJC president Keith Landy told Canadian Press.

B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant said it's unacceptable for Graham to consider the matter closed.

Saying Graham "caved in," Dimant told the Ottawa Citizen that B'nai Brith will pursue "all avenues" to have Baaklini removed and that it would raise the matter when Parliament resumes later this month.

The meeting with Graham was the second time Canadian officials have questioned Baaklini about his comments.

On Jan. 10, Baaklini was called in to explain himself to John McNee, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' assistant deputy minister for Africa and the Middle East.

But Baaklini later repeated his remarks to a newspaper in Saudi Arabia and was quoted in the Saudi and Lebanese press that the controversy was fuelled by papers "under the control of Zionist groups and institutions in Canada."

Asked by the National Post to clarify his remarks, Baaklini said he might have used different words if speaking to an English-language paper, but he then repeated the main thrust of his comments.

"I wanted to say exactly that 90 per cent of the mass media in Canada is controlled by Jews or Zionists and those Jews or Zionists are also supported by other organizations in the [United] States," he said.

Graham said last week that he "wanted to speak to [Baaklini] personally and make my personal position and that of the government of Canada absolutely clear about how seriously we take this matter."

Israel caught in glare from Iraq and N. Korea

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

With so much media attention focused on Iraq's acquisition of weapons of mass destruction (WMDs) and on North Korea's pursuit of nuclear arms in defiance of the international community, how long will it be before the spotlight turns on Israel?

Not too long, it appears.

In his article "What this war is not about" (Globe and Mail, Jan. 3) Rick Salutin, obsessed with Israel's alleged sins, argues that the United States is hypocritical in trying to eliminate the threat of Iraq acquiring nuclear weapons while not confronting Israel for the same reason. "[UN] Security Council Resolution 687, paragraph 14," Salutin pontificates, "calls for removing all WMDs from the Mideast. The U.S. never volunteered to enforce that clause."

Salutin's reference is misleading. Resolution 687 (April 3, 1991), was the fourteenth Chapter 7 Security Council resolution passed specifically against Iraq following its invasion of Kuwait. It demanded that Iraq unconditionally and unilaterally accept the "destruction, removal, or rendering harmless, under international supervision," of all its non-conventional weapons and the missiles designed to deliver them.

Paragraph 14 "notes" that actions to be taken by Iraq would "represent steps towards the goal of establishing in the Middle East a zone free of weapons of mass destruction."

This is the expression of a long-term aim. The extent of the "Middle East zone" has been left undefined. There is no "demand" that the international community, led by the United States, unconditionally disarm countries like Israel of its nuclear weapons.

Salutin's comparison is absurd, as is his claim that Israel's arsenal, "scares the hell out of its neighbours."

Israel's neighbours may indeed have strong emotions – resentment, envy, even jealousy – about its nuclear capabilities. But fear is not one of them, except when it is feigned in anti–Israel propaganda. It is widely understood in the Arab world that Israel's nuclear force is meant solely as a deterrent against aggression.

Nor far behind Salutin's nonsense came Harper's Magazine editor Lewis Lapham's mindless comparison of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to North Korean President Kim Chong-il and Saddam Hussein (on Counterspin, Jan. 8), when his interlocutor, Ruth Wedgewood of the U.S. Defence Policy Board insisted that the United States must confront rogue leaders such as Saddam, "a man of extraordinary erratic judgment." Lapham singled out Israel, and propounded the fallacious argument that Israel, like Iraq, is in violation of UN resolutions, implying that the United States should not confront Iraq if it is unwilling to confront Israel.

Continuing this trend was commentator Eric Margolis, speaking on TVOntario's Diplomatic Immunity (Jan. 10). Like Salutin and Lapham, Margolis insisted it is wrong for the United States to confront its enemies but to ignore Israel's nuclear weapons. (Margolis also mentioned India's possession of nuclear weapons, but he ignored Pakistan, which is similarly armed and highly unstable.)

Frank Gaffney of the Center for Security Policy in Washington, D.C., brought some sanity to the issue. He pointed out that the problem is not non-conventional weapons themselves, but their possession by "lunatic, rogue, megalomaniacal regimes bent on their use," a qualification that far and away excludes Israel and India.

And University of Toronto political scientist Janice Stein reminded everyone that regional nuclear disarmament must follow, and not precede, regional peace agreements, something Israel has long supported.

Paul Michaels is director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Toronto Jews: Hamilton wants you!

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — The local Jewish community here hopes to increase its population by 80 families within three years with a marketing campaign targeting young Jews, primarily from Toronto.

"We have an aging Jewish community. The number of young families is decreasing, as seen by the enrolment in the private day schools and after-school Hebrew programs," said Vicky Wylson-Sher, the chair of a UJA Federation of Hamilton committee looking to increase the area's Jewish population, which stands at about 5,000.

"We would like to regenerate our community and expand it."

The committee is seeking community input to name the campaign. Once it is chosen – which is expected in the next month or so – the committee will solicit designs for a logo to be featured on all promotional material.

Wylson-Sher said marketing plans have not been finalized, but efforts to attract Toronto Jews may include such things as ads in The CJN and a new section on the community's Web site, jewishhamilton.org.

Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Temple Anshe Shalom in Hamilton, said that when he moved to the community about 50 years ago, the Jewish population stood at about 3,500.

It has grown since then, he said, but has remained stagnant in recent years as younger people have left for Toronto, as they have from other smaller communities nearby.

"We have everything a huge city has to offer and more, only in Toronto it takes three times as long to get anywhere," Wylson-Sher said.

"There's wonderful outdoor life here. There are great conservation areas, hiking trails and biking trails… It's a terrific place to bring up kids."

The cost of housing is a significant factor in attracting new families, Wylson-Sher said, noting that an executive-style, four-bedroom home in the Hamilton area can cost up to 50 per cent less than a similar home in Toronto.

Another issue of concern for the committee is the problem of young people leaving the area to attend university and not returning. The committee will also focus on McMaster graduate students and medical students who might consider staying in Hamilton once they complete their programs.

Wylson-Sher cited employment opportunities as "a key ingredient to families considering relocating" and noted that "Hamilton has one of the lowest unemployment rates of any city in Canada." (Hamilton's unemployment rate is 5.4 per cent, according to the latest figures from Statistics Canada).

The job factor is one reason why there has been an increase in the area's overall population, Wylson-Sher said. According to Statistics Canada, between 1996 and 2001, about 28,500 people moved from Toronto to the Hamilton-Burlington-Grimsby area.

UJA Federation of Hamilton has allocated funds for a grant-writer, who is seeking funding to hire a full-time staff person by next fall to research employment opportunities for newcomers and to co-ordinate the effort to attract them.

"This is a welcoming, close-knit community," Wylson-Sher said. "People are discovering Hamilton, Ancaster and Dundas, which are affordable, wonderful places to live."

Wendy Schneider, the committee's federation staff representative, said "there is a wealth of natural beauty in this area. People think of Hamilton as steel city. They often have no conception of what we have to offer. This initiative is as much about education as anything else.

"What we're trying to do is buck the trend of families who find it too burdensome living in the Toronto area because of the cost of living and who are willing to move north of the city, often as far away as Barrie. If they are willing to move north, why not consider moving west where there is so much value [and] a high quality of life."

Wylson-Sher can be reached by e-mail at idoc@sympatico.ca.

Winnipeg student receives Rhodes Scholarship

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Five years ago, Ariel Zylberman's family was one of the first to move from Buenos Aires to Winnipeg. Now Zylberman is preparing to move again. In September, he will be attending Oxford University in England on a Rhodes Scholarship.

Zylberman, 22, is the third young member of Winnipeg's Jewish community to receive the scholarship in the last five years, following in the footsteps of David Selchen and Sarah Kreindler.

"Oxford was where I really wanted to go for my master's degree," says the University of Winnipeg philosophy student. "With the scholarship, I will be able to study with some of the greatest thinkers of our time and I won't have to worry about finances."

His field of interest is causation – whether there is a distinction between causes that are natural and those that are a result of human choice.

The Zylberman family is one of about 45 Argentine Jewish families who have come to Winnipeg in the last six years. Evelyn Hecht, spokesperson for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, reports that another 40 are expected within the next six months as Argentina's Jewish population seeks to escape economic chaos and political uncertainty. Most are young families or newlyweds with no children.

The Winnipeg Jewish community outreach effort in Argentina was started on the recommendation of former premier Gary Filmon and his wife Janice, after they met and spoke to an Argentine Jewish passenger when they were travelling several years ago. Larry Hurtig, the Winnipeg Jewish Federation president at the time, went to Buenos Aires, met with members of the Jewish community there, and got the ball rolling.

"We knew nothing about Winnipeg when we came here," Zylberman says. "We thought we would try it here for a year and then if we didn't like it, maybe go somewhere else in Canada. Winnipeg has been very welcoming and friendly and we are comfortable here."

He has contributed to his new community in a variety of ways. He dances with the Chai Folk Ensemble and is a Jewish Child and Family Service Big Brother.

Zylberman expects to be studying at Oxford for at least the next two years. He would like eventually to come back to Winnipeg and teach at university here.

"My family and friends are in Winnipeg and I received the bulk of my education here," he says. "It would be a great pleasure to come back here and teach."

U.S. Patriot batteries deployed in Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — American soldiers currently stationed in Israel have deployed three Patriot missile batteries in the centre and north of the country as part of a joint U.S.-Israeli exercise in preparation for the anticipated war in Iraq.

The technical and logistical equipment that was set up in the first stage is to be followed by the deployment of the actual missiles.

The three American batteries come in addition to the two Patriot batteries and Arrow batteries already deployed by the Israel Defence Forces.

Unlike in the 1991 Gulf War, these Patriots are designed to defend Israel against attacks from the air and not against long-range missiles.

The drill, dubbed "Jennifer Cobra," aims to improve co-operation between the two armies in the event of missiles being fired at Israel or an attempt to penetrate Israeli airspace. It is expected to last several weeks.

The Patriot batteries in Haifa and the central area will remain there until the end of the week and will then be taken to the Negev, where a Patriot missile will be fired "live" in the next stage of the joint exercise.

An American anti-missile radar vessel is also participating in the exercise.

The American forces are due to remain in Israel until the war against Iraq is over. If and when hostilities break out, they will again deploy their equipment in strategic locations in Israel. Another two Patriot batteries are due to arrive in the country from Germany and will remain here for two years.

Iran linked to Tel Aviv terror attack

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Security establishment experts suspect that Iranian Revolutionary Guards operating in Lebanon were involved in the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv on Jan. 6. The attack, in which 23 people were killed near the old central bus station, was carried out by two Fatah activists from Nablus.

As Ha'aretz published last month, Israel has evidence that Iran has been sending both money and instructions, usually via Lebanon, to Fatah, the PLO's military branch known as the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, in Nablus. Israel is now checking whether the cell involved in the attack received money from Iran to finance its activities.

Apparently, the instructions for attacks came partly from the Iranians, although it is not clear yet whether the timing and location of the attack in Tel Aviv were set by Tehran.

The security establishment last week released information indicating that Majd Al-Masri, the commander of the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades in Samaria, who was captured two months ago, revealed the sources of funding for the faction's terrorist activities during his interrogation.

The money, a total of almost $50,000 (US), was transferred from Munir Maqdah, head of a Fatah branch in Lebanon, and from Ali Hussein Salah, a Palestinian living in Lebanon, who is apparently in contact with the Iranians.

Masri, whom the Shin Bet allowed journalists to interview last week in his cell in Petah Tikva, confirmed he received money from Lebanon, but avoided saying whether he was in touch with Iranian intelligence. Masri also said there is no difficulty raising funds for terrorist activity in the territories.

STERN, Gershon. The Yeshiva University family and Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University are deeply grieved by the passing of our beloved, longtime friend and distinguished leader who for more than 25 years was a member of the YU Board of Trustees. He also served as National President of Canadian Friends of Yeshiva University and was currently Honorary National President. He was a member of the Board of Directors of the Sy Syms School of Business (SSSB) where he and his wife, Merle, YU Benefactors, established the Gershon and Merle Stern Chair in Banking and Finance. He served as a past member of the Board of Trustees of YU's affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS). An alumnus of Yeshiva College, he also received an honorary degree from YU in 1984. Our heartfelt condolences are extended to Merle and their children: Sharon (and William) Hyman, Judy (and David) Lobel, Jonathan (and Kris) Stern, brother Zalman (and Barbara) Stern, and grandchildren: Caroline, Alexandra, Andrew, and Zachary. May the entire family be comforted among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

Canadian grassroots leaders hear journalists in Israel

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

JERUSALEM — A panel of Israeli and Canadian journalists met in Jerusalem last Thursday to discuss the challenges they face when reporting on the Middle East.

Panellists Globe and Mail reporter Paul Adams, CBC correspondent Neil MacDonald, Jerusalem Post editor Amotz Asa-El and CJN op-ed writer and Bar-Ilan University professor Gerald Steinberg presented their perspective on the Mideast conflict and discussed the language used by the media.

The discussion was part of the Local Israel Action Team (LIAT) leadership mission, under which the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) brought a group of 20 grassroots activists to the Jewish state to develop skills that will help them increase their advocacy efforts on Israel's behalf.

The Israeli journalists stressed the importance of giving depth and context to media reports about the area.

The media are using the wrong map if they focus only on the area between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River or the West Bank and Israel, Steinberg said.

"Focusing on this little piece of land without seeing the broader Middle Eastern context is problematic, if not wrong," he added.

Where, Steinberg asked, are the news stories about the accumulation of armaments and weapons of mass destruction by Arab countries? Or the articles about the increase in incitement and hatred against Jews in Syria, Egypt or Jordan, and the degree to which these factors affect Israeli politics?

A CIC-led visit to Israel last week by a delegation of parliamentarians overlapped with the LIAT program. Here the parliamentations plant trees in celebration of Tu b'Shvat.

He said reporters are also often reluctant to ask the right questions. For example, in the 1990s, many knew about the build-up of arms and increased propaganda that preceded the suicide bombings, but did not ask questions. Today, reporters should be addressing whether the real goal of the Palestinians is the establishment of a Palestinian state next to Israel or the destruction of the Jewish state.

Reporters use language to project their own opinions, he said.

"When we use the language of moral equivalency and put suicide bombings on the same plane as military incursions, it provides the reader with a subjective analysis that most readers will adopt without thinking twice," Steinberg said.

Asa-El noted that foreign reporters are reluctant to distinguish between violence against Israeli civilians, which he defines as terrorism, and attacks against the army, which should be called guerrilla warfare.

In addition, he noted that Israel is "way over-covered." Not enough attention is given to stories about the oppression and killing of people in countries such as Algeria, where 100,000 Arabs were recently killed, Asa-El said.

MacDonald agreed that the Middle East is over-covered, but said he refuses to use the word terrorism to describe suicide bombings because the term "has been overexploited by governments and political organizations to the point that it's been rendered not worth the breath required to say it."

He admires Noam Chomsky's writings on the media, he said.

"I think he's right when he says that the media fancies itself the watchdog of the establishment, when it's in fact the guard dog of the establishment and there is a deep pro-establishment bias in the press," MacDonald said.

He said he finds it beyond belief that "critical coverage of Israel somehow becomes anti-Semitic," noting that in some reports, he has also called Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat a corrupt dictator.

In addition, he said, he believes that "our audience is mature enough to listen to critical coverage [of the area] without going out to stone Muslims and Jews afterwards."

Adams said most people accept that different perspectives in the media are a reflection of a pluralistic western democratic society. However, in today's stressful and hostile environment, pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian communities are reluctant to hear the other's point of view.

Today, "two mutually exclusive dialogues are taking place and the narratives they're constructing are antipathetic to each other."

Instead of seeing an array of perspectives, the two communities tend to make judgments about each other's bias, and the media are blamed for any point of view that appears sympathetic to the other side, Adams said.

The members of a delegation of 20 Canadian parliamentarians from different political parties, who were also in Israel on a CIC mission, joined the LIAT group for the panel.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest .

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2003 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 21, 2003. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 28, 2003.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 13, 2003. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Renowned founder of Bible Lands Museum dies at 89

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

Scholar and collector Elie Borowski, founder of Jerusalem's Bible Lands Museum, died last Tuesday in his home in Jerusalem. He was 89.

Borowski was born in Warsaw on May 27, 1913. He studied at the Tachkemoni and Mir yeshivas, as well as at the Collegio Rabbinico Italiano in Florence before he became interested in the art and history of the ancient Near East. He went on to study at the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome, the Sorbonne and the Ecole du Louvre, both in Paris, and the University of Geneva.

Just before the outbreak of World War II, he went to Vichy, France, where he served in the Jewish unit of the French army. When the Nazis invaded, his regiment retreated to Switzerland, where they were interned for the rest of the war. While there, he worked at the Museum of Art and History in Geneva, studying Mesopotamian seals and cuneiform tablets.

Devastated at losing his family to the Holocaust, he continued his studies and became an expert on ancient art and inscriptions, with an emphasis on the biblical period. After the publication of his doctoral thesis on ancient cylinder seals, he was awarded a Lady Davis fellowship to work as a research associate at the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto. For nearly 50 years, he moved between homes in Basel, Switzerland, and Toronto.

Over the years, he amassed a priceless collection of ancient near eastern art and became known as a leading authority on the biblical period and a prominent international dealer.

An exhibition of his collection, called Ladders to Heaven, travelled throughout Canada and Europe in 1981.

Longtime friend Donald Carr, the president of The CJN, said in an interview that Borowski established the Land of the Bible Archeological Foundation in Toronto and looked for a home for his collection in Canada.

But after Borowski and his wife, Batya, moved to Israel, the couple decided that the proper home for his collection was in Jerusalem. With the help of then-Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek, they designed, built and established the Bible Lands Museum.

Opened on May 11, 1992, adjacent to the Israel Museum, the Bible Lands Museum is the only such institution in the world dedicated to the history of the biblical period.

Each artifact was chosen by Borowski from his collection and reflected his love and enthusiam for his subject. Cynthia Gasner, also a friend from Toronto, described him as "a visionary and a dreamer. Generations to come will be influenced by what he created."

Borowski was predeceased by a son from his first marriage, Reuven, and is survived by his wife, Batya, her children Amanda Weiss and Jessica Waller, and five grandchildren.

Canada Centre having financial difficulties

A native of Winnipeg who made aliyah in 1962, Arenson said "the centre is like all the rest of Israel, and in particular the border area, which has seen a tremendous drop in the number of visitors using the facilities. Last year, compared with 2001, 25 per cent fewer visitors came to the centre and 2001 was a bad year also. As a result, the centre is running into a very large deficit. It's unfortunately far from thriving; in fact, it is in danger of being shut down.

"My job right now is to justify the ongoing activities of the Canada Centre," said Arenson, one of Israel's largest general contractors. "The centre is accepted by the local people in Metulla and the area, but we have to convince the Israeli government and the Ministry of Sport and Culture and the various funding" bodies that there is a place for Canada Centre.

Centre management has already trimmed costs and shelved some programs, Finkelstein said, but without the revenue generated by paying customers or other sources of support, the centre will remain in jeopardy.

Avie Arenson

Outside agencies have already responded to calls for help. Two years ago, UIA Federations Canada and the Jewish Agency poured $500,000 into the centre. Last year, the UIA, immersed in its Israel Emergency Campaign, did not transfer any funds and the centre ran a deficit, she said.

The $300,000 transfer for the current fiscal year should give the centre some breathing room this year, she and Halbert agreed.

"My sense is we're optimistic about the coming year," Finkelstein said. "I feel very strongly it's an important project of ours. It was built for a specific reason and we have a responsibility to support it. But if it's no longer financially viable, we'll have to look at the future of the operation to change its focus or change its function."

The Canada Centre was constructed with funds largely contributed by Canadian supporters. It features an Olympic-sized skating rink – the only one in the Middle East – a smaller rink, swimming pools, basketball and squash courts, a fully equipped fitness and health club, a shooting range and a bowling alley.

Halbert called it "the jewel in the crown of UIA Canada's projects in Israel."

The rink is home to Skate Israel, the country's modest figure skating program, and it's also home ice for Israel's national junior team, which will be visiting Toronto and Montreal this week.

Most importantly, Canada Centre serves the recreational needs of Israel's northern population. "It adds to the quality of life and encourages people to live there," Finkelstein said.

Halbert said he will stress that point when he meets with potential contributors. "I'll tell them how important it is for the people in the region. Without the Canada Centre, it will take away all the recreation they have. Psychologically, it will be a terrible thing for them."

Even prior to the intifadah, Canada Centre was beginning to experience financial difficulties. During a visit to Toronto in late 2000, with the intifadah barely under way, the late Yossi Goldberg, then mayor of Metulla, told The CJN that Canada Centre was experiencing problems. He traced those difficulties to Israel's military pullback from Lebanon in May 2000.

"The public has stopped travelling across the country," he said at the time.

French Jews happy, but not without fear

By ELIAHU SALPETER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — The stabbing here earlier this month of Reform Rabbi Gabriel Farhi and the burning of his car, as well as the sabotaging of a Marseilles Jewish radio station's broadcasting antenna, have revived the fears French Jews last felt during the wave of anti-Semitic attacks this past summer.

Many Jews worry that the hopes they nurtured through six months of relative quiet, when there were no serious anti-Semitic incidents, have proven false. Optimists in the community believe the extremism that marked the attacks in 2002 was unique and stemmed from strong Israeli reaction to Palestinian suicide bombings.

In the months after the anti-Semitic attacks, France's new right-wing government launched a vigorous new police initiative against radical Muslims as part of a nationwide campaign against crime. As a result, no major anti-Semitic acts were reported.

The attacks on the rabbi and his synagogue are being investigated from several angles. One that may or may not be probed is that haredi or extreme right-wing Jews were responsible for the attacks. The press has reported on haredi and right-wing hostility toward the Reform movement – a Reform synagogue was set on fire last spring – and toward Rabbi Farhi, who is an active advocate of peace with the Palestinians.

The Jewish community's sensitivity was also heightened in recent weeks by the public debate over efforts by leftist and Arab students and professors to launch an academic boycott of Israel.

Among French Jewish organizations, the fight against the boycott is high on the political agenda. Protests and demonstrations – along with UNESCO's denunciation of the boycott proposals – have so far averted the threat and shown that the French public now responds more quickly to expressions of anti-Semitism than it did in the past.

According to polls published in the newspaper Le Monde, 77 per cent of French Jews fear for their personal safety due to Islamic terrorism. The newspaper also published interviews with several poll respondents.

One said: "In the midst of a fight to allow the [Muslim] women to walk around wearing a scarf on their heads, we have to tell our kids to stop wearing a kippah in order not to provoke the anti-Semitic population." The paper also quoted a teacher in a Jewish school, who told his students: "We must be alert. Alertness has always been part of the Jewish baggage we carry around."

The French press noted in its articles on anti-Semitic incidents that the number of immigrants from France to Israel more than doubled in the last year, from 1,156 in 2001 to 2,566 in 2002, though these numbers are negligible relative to the total number of Jews in France – estimated at 600,000, compared to about five million Muslims.

Last year, the United Jewish Social Funds, an umbrella group responsible for the Jewish community's vast network of social and welfare projects, found in a survey that six per cent of French Jews are contemplating aliyah in the near future. Three per cent of French Jews said the same in a similar survey in 1988.

Pollster Eric Cohen of Bar-Ilan University also noted that 20 per cent of those questioned reported that they had personally experienced verbal or physical anti-Semitism.

Yet the survey found that, despite anti-Semitic incidents, 89 per cent of French Jews said they are satisfied with their situation and 91 per cent said they feel "very happy."

According to the poll, topping the list of worries among French Jews are, in order of importance, terrorism, anti-Semitism and the future of Israel.

Intermarriage is fourth on the list. The current rate of intermarriage is around 40 per cent among French Jews under 30. This rate is lower than among young U.S. Jews (more than 50 per cent), but it is very high given the fact that more than two thirds of French Jews are of North African origin and assimilate less than Ashkenazi Jews.

Jewish spokespeople prefer to downplay the impact of anti-Semitism on the increase in immigration to Israel. The growth stems, they say, from the Jews' desire to help strengthen the security of the State of Israel.

Such explanations also reflect the debate within the French Jewish community in France, as in Jewish communities elsewhere, over the question of how to respond to anti-Semitic attacks.

One approach says the response should be loud and be aggressive. But others say it should be muted, so as to prevent confrontation with the political establishment.

Another debate in the community is between those who see the attacks as echoing events in the Middle East and those who see them as a return to old-fashioned French anti-Semitism.

The latter point out that Voltaire, the father of the French Enlightenment, was an anti-Semite; that the father of modern racism, Arthur de Gobineau, was French; that the Dreyfus affair took place in France; and that the Vichy government collaborated with the Nazis to send Jews to Auschwitz.

The former note that Rousseau and Montesquieu, the giants of French political thought were supportive of Jews; that French Jews in the Napoleonic era were the first in Europe to obtain full civil rights; and that the real hero of the Dreyfus affair was the writer Emile Zola.

The debate recurs in France with each new wave of anti-Semitism.

In the two weeks that passed after Rabbi Farhi was attacked, the loud public denunciations of anti-Semitic incidents stood in sharp contrast to the position taken by some Jews who would have preferred to quietly take care of the incidents.

Reports about the attacks on Rabbi Farhi made the front pages of the newspapers. President Jacques Chirac sharply denounced the attack and Le Monde published a lead article attacking the attempts to organize an academic boycott. And four past prime ministers, the mayor of Paris and leading French cultural and religious figures crowded into Rabbi Farhi's synagogue to protest the attacks against him.

Yet, while a large part of the leadership of French Jewry belongs to the liberal camp, it was a socialist government that preferred to downgrade the significance of the anti-Semitic incidents, while the new right-wing government, and especially Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, a "law and order" man, has promised to use a strong hand against anti-Semitic violence.

Belgium amending law to enable Sharon trial

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — Belgian Prime Minister Guy Verhofstadt said last week he does not oppose a plan to amend the country's war crimes laws, in order to be able to indict Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for war crimes.

Verhofstadt was commenting on the efforts of several politicians in Belgium's senate to amend and broaden the laws. Under the proposal, originally sponsored mainly by left-wing politicians in the senate, Belgium's 1993 Universal Law would be expanded to apply to any person suspected of war crimes, "no matter where the suspect may be located."

The proposal was backed by all parties in the senate. It was then moved to the state council, a body that reviews the legal status of proposed bills and evaluates their compatibility with Belgium's constitution.

The council approved the proposed amendment and the bill returned to the senate, where it passed on first reading. Second and third reading votes were to be carried out this week, and the senate is expected to approve it. Belgium's government also supports the law, and now the prime minister has clarified that he doesn't oppose it.

Last June, a Belgian appeals court ruled that Sharon could not face trial in the country on war crimes charges, because only suspects who live in Belgium can face trial for war crimes committed beyond the country's borders.

Israeli officials expressed consternation about Verhofstadt's position. The Belgian prime minister visited Israel over a year ago, when he was acting chair of the European Union, and he met with Sharon.

Sources say the meeting created the impression that Verhofstadt had reservations about the legal proceedings that were then being carried out in Belgium against Sharon. The sources claimed that Belgium stands out as one of the European countries most hostile toward Israel.

Belgium's ambassador to Israel, who was called to the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem early last week, was informed of Israel's concerns regarding the proposed new bill.

Arts For Kids! Year Round Fun at BBS

The BSS Erin Gilmour Summer Arts Workshops were founded to ensure that young people who were passionate about the arts could totally immerse themselves in their art form.

Starting in 1997, the program mandate has been to establish working relationships between artists in the community and these aspiring young artists. We look for artists to share their vision of their specific art form with the students. As children are all unique and different so is the wide array of arts programs we offer. We are continually looking for new programs that will expand the understanding, technique and virtuosity of our young artists. We hope to cover the breadth of artistic disciplines from the traditional to the avant garde.

The workshops are and must remain intensive, hands-on with low student to teacher ratios. At the same time, our success to date has been gratifying. We have resisted the temptation to become "just another summer camp" and continue to attract truly committed artists, both young and established, to share their skills and talent.

Cottage Reena 2003

Reena is once again sponsoring a Summer Cottage program during the months of July and August, for teens (over 16) and adults with a developmental disability.

This integrated two-week vacation package incorporates life skills and social skills-training into exciting and varied leisure/recreational activities.

The cottages are located in the beautiful and rustic Georgian Bay tourist district.

A full and exciting program is being planned.

Summer Recreation Program

AN EXCITING ADVENTURE

Reena offers an exciting adventure for teens and young adults (from 13-21 years of ages) with a developmental disability.

Indoor sports, music, computer fun and arts/crafts are offered weekly at the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre (Clark/Bathurst Street) along with community outings and swimming.

You can register for a day - a week - or the full program which runs for eight weeks throughout the summer.

Priority is given to individuals living with their families in the Community.

Canada's Premier Golf Camp

Par Golf Camps is now entering its 11th fabulous summer as Canada's premier golf instruction organization.

Instruction is provided for beginners, intermediate and advanced golfers all under the auspices of Joshua Cooper, golf professional and coach of the Maccabi Youth Golf Team. Campers are picked up at home and brought to the campsite, an 18 hole golf course with a driving range, short game area and indoor facilities. Therefore, there is no busing throughout the day as all activities are held at the same location.

Children are placed in select groups based on their age and ability. The daily routine focuses on different aspects of golf. Campers play nine holes twice a week throughout their two week session. One month and leadership training programs are also available.

In addition to junior camps, Par Golf hosts adult golf camps. One, two and three day golf camps are held throughout the golf season. On course instruction is a primary focus at all two and three day adult camps. Golfers learn in actual playing scenarios instead of just on a driving range.

Par Golf Camps is offering weekend junior programs beginning in May. Call us for more information.

For more information on any of our programs, please visit our website at www.learngolf.com or call us at telephone (416) 960-GOLF (4653).

Hashomer Hatzair / Camp Shomria

Camp Shomria offers a dynamic and exciting summer camp experience for youths 7-16 from Canada, the U.S., and around the world. A variety of challenging sports, theme days, educational and cultural activities create an atmosphere designed to build life-long friendships. It's located on Otty Lake, a beautiful waterfront, ideal for a wide selection of fun-filled water activities.

Camp Shomria promotes deep love for Israel and the North American Jewish community. It's run by the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement, established over 80 yrs. ago, and is active within the Jewish community. There are weekly activities available throughout the school year in Toronto and a 6-day residential winter camp during December. A special one-week introductory camping experience is offered to campers in grades 2 and 3. Activities include dance, arts & crafts, a dynamic drama program, hikes, trips and a rope course (see directory). Grade 10 graduates participate in a leadership training program, "Yedid Plus", which includes an intensive 5 wk. itinerary in Israel.

Staff are dedicated and committed. Most were Shomria campers. Camp Shomria has a full-time registered nurse on site. Health and safety is our top priority. OCA standards of excellence are met and often exceeded. To learn more about Camp Shomria, please call Ora or Miriam at 416-736-1339.

Lubavitch Day Camp

It is our belief that a camp should do a lot more than just provide fun and games. A Jewish camp should be a place where children can also experience the richness, excitement and warmth of Judaism in a truly enjoyable and unforgettable atmosphere!

We provide hot lunches, door to door transportation, instructional and recreational swimming, a warm Jewish atmosphere, creative playground, arts & crafts, dance, martial arts, sports and much more, for children 2 1/2—12.

The daily schedule runs from 9 a.m.—4 p.m. Monday—Friday, for children ages 5 1/2—12, for 3—5 1/2 year olds the camp day is from 10 a.m.—3 p.m. and our morning program for 2 1/2—3 1/2 year olds runs from 10 a.m.—1 p.m.

We offer large discounts for registration before March 15th and a discount for each additional child.

To receive more information or to register please contact our camp director Rabbi Mendel Bernstein at 905-731-7000 or 770 Chabad Gate, Thornhill, Ont. L4J 3V9.

Ramah - The Camping Arm of the Conservative Movement

Another exciting year at Camp B'nai Brith Ottawa

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is a privately owned overnight camp located in the foothills of the Gatineaus, 45 minutes outside of Ottawa. We have a long and successful camping history of well over 60 years. Our camp prides itself in welcoming children from all over the world. Although we are a private Ottawa camp we treasure our many campers from Montreal, Toronto, New York, Florida, Israel and even the Caribbean.

Camp B'nai Brith has a varied program to stimulate children with many different interests. We offer an extensive number of different programs such as drama, arts & crafts, dance, tennis, basketball, miniature golf, all camp programs (Grey Cup/Super Bowl, World Cup, Colour War, etc.) and tremendous camp spirit. Our waterfront overlooking the Ottawa River has a sandy beach which is home to our vast watersports. They include waterskiing, windsurfing, knee-boarding, kayaking, canoeing, sailing and a Catamaran. Our Olympic size heated pool allows campers to enjoy swimming away from the hub of activities at the beach. Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is very proud of our extremely successful Red Cross aquaquest program which offers all levels of instruction up to and including Bronze Cross.

Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa offers a kosher kitchen (Ottawa VAAD Kashruth) and is also a PEANUT SENSITIVE camp. In addition, we offer a Judaica program which is fun but yet traditional. This includes weekly Shabbat services. We also have an indoor gym, dance studio,recreation hall and an on-site infirmary which has a fully qualified medical staff.

One area we are most sensitive to is the anxiety of our younger campers coming to camp for the first time. To ease this situation we have instituted 2 very successful programs. Firstly, we offer our 2 wk. starter camp for new C.B.B. campers aged 7-10. The other is our Big Brother/Big Sister program which pairs younger campers with older campers prior to and during camp to help campers feel more at ease.

If you are interested in giving your child an active, stimulating and exciting summer camp experience, then Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa is the place to be. For more information please call Morley Mason at 613-228-8495.

Top camping at low costs

Camp Eitan has been directed by Rabbis Michoel Levine and Moshe Weinberg for the past 24 years.

Both teachers at Eitz Chaim Schools, they offer the most in camping for the lowest price. The prices are the same as last year and include door-to-door bus transportation within a designated area, hot kosher lunches (under COR supervision) and basic instructional swimming.

Also included are gymnastics, overnights, computers, arts & crafts, weekly trips and a varied sports program. The camp is located in Eitz Chaim Schools and offers modern air-conditioned indoor facilities for rainy day activities.

A recent innovation in our boy's division is our baseball camp, offered at our same low price. Coaching, video instruction, practice and game situations are aimed at helping campers at the lower skill levels, as well.

Our older girls' division designed to meet the needs of girls grades 3-5, also offers an optional baseball camp.

In our preschool division, special daily events, preschool classrooms, playground equipment, a weekly theme and a caring staff provide the younger child with a safe and happy summer experience.

Camp Shalom - 55 and going strong

Camp Shalom is getting ready to celebrate its 55th year in the upcoming 2003 camping season. Located on beautiful Lake Muskoka, the camp has established itself as one of the most outstanding Zionist Jewish camps for boys and girls aged 8-13 in the Gravenhurst area of Ontario.

Shalom campers experience the joys of a terrific summer vacation, under the care of a well-trained staff, with a better-than-3:1 camper-to-staff ratio. As a not-for profit camp affiliated with Canadian Young Judaea and accredited by the Ontario Camping Association, Camp Shalom imbues its campers with a sense of Jewish history, cultural values and the centrality of Israel in Jewish life. The Camp Shalom ethic promotes the ideals of mutual respect, sharing and fair play in interpersonal relationships.

Camp Shalom features an individualized program wherein each child is free to choose from over 25 daily activities including canoe, sailing, ropes, baseball, basketball, tennis, inter-camp sports, archery, self-defense, gymnastics, dance, fitness, beach volleyball, mini-golf, daily instructional swim, waterskiing, kayaking, drama, arts & crafts, photography, expanded tripping program, nature, scouting, music, camp newspaper, sports house leagues, rock climbing, media program, golf activities and more.

The Camp Shalom staff is looking forward to the upcoming summer and the privilege of sharing another wonderful season with so many fortunate campers. Come join our family!

Camp Moshava Canada – Camping above all the rest!

Camp Moshava Canada, the only Orthodox, Zionist, B'nei Akiva camp in Canada, is situated on 250 acres of beachfront property in the beautiful Kawartha Lakes region.

In recent years, Camp Moshava Canada has established a reputation for serving fine food. Our 2nd service salad bar is extremely popular with the campers. No matter one's requirements, all campers' dietary needs are met.

Moshava has a Beit Midrash and an outdoor Beit Knesset, an unparalleled indoor Recreation Centre featuring regulation size basketball, volleyball and floor hockey courts as well as an indoor/outdoor stage. The camp boasts an extensive high ropes course, rock climbing wall, biking, and a ball hockey rink.

Moshava has a 2-week "splash of camp" program designed for grade 2 graduates. The camp's regularly scheduled days include instructional swimming in an outdoor heated pool, canoeing, water-skiing, a full sports program, thematic arts & crafts and drama. Special days include colour war, sports day, canoe trips, overnights, hiking, nature trips and fishing.

What makes Camp Moshava unique goes far beyond facilities, events and personalities. The atmosphere that exists amongst staff and campers is truly special. Only those who have actually encountered a Shabbat at Camp Moshava Canada can truly appreciate what the experience is like! Camp Moshava is not just a summer camp experience, it's an experience of a lifetime!

The Joys of Summer

At Camp Eden, children experience the joys of summer in a natural setting, ideal for exploration and activities: 30 acres of grassy pasture, nature trails and woodland, located nearby in Thornhill.

The camp offers an experience like no other. Activities include arts, crafts, initiative tasks, co-operative games, nature, music, sports, drama, swimming, theme days, and many surprises. In our safe, structured environment, children develop skills, form lasting friendships, and create memories that will endure through adulthood.

Children with an interest in art will enjoy the Specialty Art Camp with Branka Bradic, a qualified teacher from the Klim School of Art. Classes are customized to each child. It's a great opportunity for them to develop artistic abilities and to express themselves. They can also participate in all other recreational activities.

The camp's directors work year-round to make summer wishes come true. Our childhood memories of camp, and extensive experience as staff, are our greatest assets. Staff are dedicated, imaginative, focused, energetic - and qualified. They stay in touch with "Meet the Staff Nights" and weekly email newsletters.

Camp Eden's office is at 1238 Centre Street, Thornhill, ON L4J 3M9. Phone 905-882-1679, fax 905-881-7711, or email: info@campeden.ca

French Holocaust film suitable for whole family

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Monsieur Batignole confronts young Simon as he leads him to safety in Switzerland.

Light-hearted comedic-dramas set during the Holocaust can either work very well, as in Life Is Beautiful, or fail, as in Jakob The Liar.

Monsieur Batignole falls somewhere in between.

In Nazi-occupied Paris, the future son-in-law of butcher Monsieur Batignole turns in their neighbours, a well-to-do Jewish family, just as they're about to escape to Switzerland.

Batignole (Gérard Jugnot) does nothing as the family is taken away, although he is reluctant to move into the larger apartment that is now vacant. But his future son-in-law, a mediocre playwright and Nazi collaborator, uses his connections to move the Batignoles to the larger apartment.

A few days later, the neighbour's young son, Simon (Jules Sitruk), having escaped, shows up at his door, unaware that the Batignoles are now living in his apartment.

Feeling partly responsible and guilty, Batignole decides to hide Simon in the cellar. To complicate matters, Simon is soon joined by his two young female cousins, also orphaned by the war.

Hiding three children in a cellar is difficult at the best of times. It's even harder with a collaborator upstairs. Soon, Batignole decides to take it upon himself to transport the children to safety in Switzerland.

Movies have been made before with a similar premise, but Monsieur Batignole takes a different, light-hearted approach with ironic humour.

At one time, as the four stop for a break, Batignole tells the children about his experiences in World War I.

"You don't know how lucky you are," he says to them, before he realizes what he just said.

There are also moments of farce, like when he has to pretend to be a doctor to a wounded Nazi officer.

Monsieur Batignole, directed by Gerard Jugnot, doesn't have the impact of Life Is Beautiful, nor does it try to. It is, however, quite enjoyable and suitable for the whole family.

Currently playing, Monsieur Batignole is in French with English subtitles.

TV show explores all of the facets of Judaism

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

After several failed efforts on local cable and multicultural channels, the latest foray in Jewish television programming arrives on Vision TV this coming Monday (Jan. 27) at 10 p.m. (repeated at 1 a.m. local time).

Jewish Sparks is Vision's first-ever weekly show about Judaism, the station says in a news release. Thirteen 30-minute episodes on subsequent Monday nights have been scheduled, all with a celebratory view toward Jewish life, culture, traditions and religious practices.

The show is distributed by the Ezrat Israel Charitable Foundation in Montreal, which was the driving force behind Keepers of the Faith, a documentary on Judaism that aired on Vision a few years ago.

Produced in Montreal, Jewish Sparks has an Orthodox feel, but is aimed at exploring all facets of Judaism, says host Rabbi Pinny Gniwisch.

"It's not necessarily from an Orthodox perspective. The overall concept is Jewish law, on which we Jews base everything," says Rabbi Gniwisch, a Montreal businessman who also runs Living Legacy, a program that teaches public school students about Judaism.

The inaugural program explores mitzvot aimed at women: baking challah, niddah (laws governing family purity, including going to a mikvah) and lighting candles to welcome Shabbat and Jewish festivals.

There are helpful explanations of terms used, shown in shaded boxes at the bottom of the screen.

The show features a demonstration of proper challah baking (with brachot), a discussion by a trio of women of tzniut (modesty in both appearance and decorum), a visit to a wig maker and another to a successful milliner who caters to an Orthodox clientele. The hatmaker, Corinne Serruya, admits that until she found her calling, she was a welfare recipient.

"Life shows us the way," she says cheerfully.

All the shows will feature "streeters" – short interviews with people on the street.

Future installments, says producer Ray Roth, will examine kashrut, Shabbat, holidays, matzah and shofar making, Montreal's eruv, the centrality of tzedakah – and exercise from a Jewish point of view.

People interviewed will include a Jewish boxer who doesn't fight on Shabbat, a young woman trying to keep kosher while backpacking through Guatemala and an Israeli astronaut trying to observe mitzvot in space.

"The idea is to get a general picture of Judaism for non-Jews too," says Rabbi Gniwisch, "and how to attain general happiness."

'Beep-and-go' drivers rule the roads in China

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

SUZHOU, China —Dewy lotus flowers, a "Stay-and-Listen" Pavilion and the Hall of Drifting Fragrance invited us to linger in the Humble Administrator's Garden in Suzhou, China.

A 45-minute train ride away, in Shanghai, just walking along Zhoushan Road, where Jewish refugees from Nazism made their homes during World War II, gave me goosebumps.

And my first view of Tiananmen Square – where hordes of Asians carried umbrellas against the relentless sun and youngsters flew long-stringed kites under the larger-than-life gaze of Chairman Mao – was riveting.

But equally memorable, on a first-time visit to China this summer, was the road traffic in each of the five cities we visited.

My husband and I made a point of hitting most of China's tourist highlights including the Great Wall, the Forbidden City, and the army of life-size terra cotta warriors in Xi'an. The sights were everything I expected them to be – impressive and historic. Some were beautiful, even charming. But no matter how many places we visited or how much time we spent en route, I was endlessly fascinated by the view from our car windows.

The sheer size of China's urban population (14 million in Shanghai alone) translates into congested roads and what my husband and I referred to privately as "beep-and-go" driving.

No matter how many oncoming cars there were, or whether pedestrians or bicycles were in the way, our driver and his counterparts would just sound their horns and proceed, sometimes turning left across four or five lanes of traffic. Whoever beeped first had the right of way. Remarkably, we saw only one minor accident.

The horns sounded unusually quiet to us – as if they were issuing a pragmatic statement of intent rather than an aggressive demand to get out of the way.

At some intersections, a digital timer counted the seconds until the traffic light changed, underscoring the modernity of China's urban scenery: multi-lane paved thoroughfares and expressways; large Petro-China gas stations, high-rise buildings and American franchises. We even saw an Outback Steakhouse in Beijing.

But roadside, we noticed farmers balancing sturdy wooden yokes on their shoulders, baskets of produce suspended from either end. There were cleaners sweeping the street with brooms and long-handled dustpans, rickshaws, pedicabs and an endless stream of utilitarian bicycles occupying their own spacious lane.

Many of the cars bore names like GM or Mitsubishi, but a solitary Lada caught our eye, reminding us of China's proximity to Russia. In one city we were transported in a Chinese-built Red Flag, a local make of car originally designed to ferry dignitaries and government officials.

Like cars, Chinese bicycles bear government-issued licence plates. Some have umbrellas mounted on the front handlebars; others carry cargo or passengers. Small children ride contentedly in bamboo seats over the rear wheels; young women perch side-saddle on flat carriers.

Of the 146 pictures we took in mainland China, one of my favourites shows a passing pedicab (like a pedalled rickshaw) painted bright red and emblazoned with McDonald's logos and Chinese script. To me it epitomizes the mix of Asian and western, old and new, that recalls China's past and hints at – or in this case boldly proclaims – its changing society.

An unconventional look at New York's Lower East Side

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Toronto writer John Miller's The Featherbed is a credible depiction of tenement life in New York's Lower East Side of a century ago, but has a number of jarring twists.

Anna and Sadie, sisters who haven't seen each other in more than 50 years, are reunited at the funeral of their mother, Rebecca, who had still lived in the family's tiny tenement apartment in lower Manhattan.

During the shivah, the sisters become reacquainted with each other as they struggle to understand the many dark family secrets and deceptions contained in their mother's diaries.

Their mother had been forced into an arranged and unhappy marriage. Her diaries, which are conveyed to us in both first-person and third-person narratives, reveal exactly how and with whom she finally found love, as well as a secret involving the parentage of one of the daughters. The diaries are at the centre of the novel.

Miller, who pays homage to writers such as Henry Roth and Abraham Cahan, never seems to lose sight of the fact that he is revisiting a hallowed literary terrain. In true Rothian fashion, for instance, Rebecca is frightened by the dark stairwell in her building, which she associates with the menacing sexuality of the human male. The book consistently portrays men unsympathetically as animalistic and abusive.

The author even throws in a reference to Cahan's short novel Yekl, which became the basis for the film Hester Street and sets the next scene in Hester Street.

Sweatshop scenes, street vendors, a union rally that turns violent, a tenement tragedy involving gas and other period markers give the book a graphic authenticity. The dialogue also manages to capture the flavour of tenement "Yinglish" on occasion, and the characters, are steeped in the familiar poverty, class struggle and sexual oppression of the era.

But grafted to this realistic period portrait is a narrative discourse about radical gender politics that is out of keeping with the times.

Locked into loveless relationships with overbearing and violent men, Miller's female protagonists break out of their bondage in shocking and unconventional ways. They are Jewish in name only, with no discernible connection to Jewish spiritual traditions or family values.

Although disturbing, The Featherbed is a bold first novel and Miller has evoked a credible feminist voice. Having previously written for Fuse magazine and Xtra!, he is a gifted literary craftsman who deserves watching.

The Featherbed is published by Simon & Pierre Fiction and costs $21.99.

Record label aims 'to make music for music lovers'

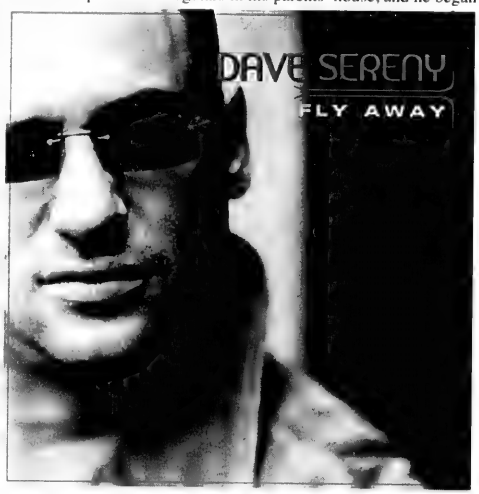
By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Don't tell Dave Sereny his music sounds commercial.

His record label and production company, Groove United Productions, aims to produce high-quality music "that grooves and unites all the rhythms of different cultures," Sereny, 37, says.

The six-year-old company in the Bathurst and Lawrence area of Toronto produces the work of jazz and rhythm and blues (R and B) artists.

In 2002, Sereny and his production team focused on singer Wade O. Brown's debut release, Complete. The first album for Groove United as a record label, Complete has been licensed in Japan and has sold 5,000 copies across Canada. Sereny jokes that he is flattered that Brown's disc has already been bootlegged.



Dave Sereny's main goal is quality over image.

Sereny is also ecstatic that Brown has attracted the attention of songwriter and producer Darryl Simmons, who has worked with Toni Braxton and Aretha Franklin.

While Simmons is the king of commercial R and B, Sereny says, "my main mission is to make music for music lovers."

With that intent, he has churned out several albums, including Come On Home by Sereny's band The High Strung Trio and a funk-inflected Spring Bird in Flight by other Groove United musicians.

Sereny has input into all areas of Groove United: engineering, production, songwriting and business matters. His partner William Van Zyl handles most of the business side, including marketing, while his brother Mike also moonlights as executive producer and helped co-found the company.

Sereny transformed his basement into a studio, complete with an all-digital 64-track recorder, organ, Pro Tools board and soundproofing walls.

"I'm knee-deep in music," says Sereny, who also sings and plays guitar. "Even though it's an uphill battle [having an independent label], I have something out there that's different, that folks can appreciate."

To a listener comparing Groove United albums to radio pop, the difference is immediately apparent. The bass-heavy tunes on Come On Home, for instance, drip with jazz and soul influences.

Sereny questions the greedy motives of major labels, noting that quality music deserves attention but is often ignored by them if it isn't radio-friendly.

"Big companies have gone commercial," he says. "Their main goal isn't quality but image."

Sereny says he learned about musical artistry by listening to jazz stars as a kid. Oscar Peterson and Miles Davis tracks were regulars in his parents' house, and he began playing guitar as a nine-year-old after listening to jazz guitarist Wes Montgomery.

He attended the Berkeley School of Music and then moved to New York to play in a rock-pop-jazz group. He says he was such a music fanatic that he would frequent Wally's Jazz Club in Boston whenever he could, and studied Wynton Marsalis tunes until he memorized them.

Sereny's parents, both Holocaust survivors, never forced Judaism on their sons. He says music is his religion, a universal language that stretches from late-night jams in South Korea to jazz festivals in Israel.

"I can go to Moscow, and not know Russian," he says, "and bond with musicians there by simply playing something like My Funny Valentine."

The team at Groove United hopes their appreciation for quality music will translate into profit, since Sereny says he has invested a lot of money without seeing much return. But he says, "I wouldn't do it if I couldn't do it."

Sereny wants to let Groove United's "big boys lead the direction," indicating that Brown's romantic R and B could take the company out of the basement.

But Sereny isn't focusing just on the boys. His wife Delihla, a Hungary-born Gypsy with a crystalline voice, released a CD, Gypsy Love, with Groove United this month. It's all part of Sereny's mission to keep the music fresh, diverse and respectable.

"We want to give people an opportunity to hear what's out there," Sereny says. "I have faith in Canadians that they will love what we have to offer."

CFTAU launches medical exchange with Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Project will focus on cancer genetics, prenatal health, reconstructive surgery and immune disorders

At its annual meeting last week, Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University (CFTAU) announced the launch of a four-pronged, $1-million exchange project between the university's Sackler School of Medicine and Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children (HSC), which is affiliated with the University of Toronto.

The seeds of the project were sown in 1998 when Judy Kopelow, an HSC critical care nurse now on leave at the Pediatric Oncology Group of Ontario, approached CFTAU seeking funding for an Israeli doctor from the Sackler School who wanted to pursue a fellowship here.

The project took on a life of its own, Kopelow said, because the Toronto organization wanted to expand on her idea after they agreed to the original funding.

"We asked both institutions what their priorities were in terms of pediatric health," said Pearl Grundland, executive director of CFTAU's Toronto office.

The new project – which will focus on cancer genetics, prenatal health, reconstructive surgery and immune disorders – is the result.

"From our standpoint, there are a number of benefits," said Grundland. "From the health standpoint, we're helping children, but another very important one in this very difficult time for Israeli doctors, professionals and academics, is declaring that we and the doctors at Sick Kids are very supportive of what's happening in Israel by the notion of supporting each other professionally. We're saying we recognize the value of working together, and we recognize the expertise on both sides of the ocean."

A program of this magnitude can give Israeli doctors "tremendous courage and strength, besides motivating excellence," said Kopelow.

The HSC physicians involved in the project – Gideon Koren, director of the Motherisk program; Ronald Laxer, HSC's vice-president of clinical and academic affairs, who will oversee the project; oncologist David Malkin; immunologist Chaim Roifman; and plastic and reconstructive surgeon Ronald Zuker – are international figures, said Kopelow.

Almost $400,000 has been raised toward the project, and fund-raising will continue over the next six years, Grundland said.

The project will get off the ground in March when Israeli physician Gideon Rahavi, head of pediatric oncology at Sackler, arrives in Toronto for a week as a visiting professor. At that time, he and Malkin will meet to discuss a collaborative project in cancer genetics, Malkin told The CJN.

Another doctor from Sackler will pursue a two-year fellowship in cancer genetics at HSC as part of the project, Malkin said. There will also be research in early detection and screening, as well as new approaches to treatment, he added.

Details are being worked out in the other areas of the project, Grundland said.

What makes this project different from previous HSC collaborations with Israeli doctors is the "formal exchange" concept with a particular medical school, Malkin said.

"There was no lack of enthusiasm" on the part of the Toronto hospital, he noted. "Boycott is not an issue here. We have had and still have support for this exchange... The support from Sick Kids for doing this is at the highest levels."

Dining Pleasures

Water workouts lauded

The Mayo Clinic says water workouts can give you the same fitness gains as workouts on land, while enabling those with arthritis, disabilities or injuries, those recovering from illness or surgery, and those who are pregnant or overweight to exercise safely.

Water's buoyancy supports your weight and significantly reduces stress on weight-bearing joints, bones and muscles, and its pressure reduces swelling resulting from injuries. If the water is warm, it relaxes muscles and eases joint stiffness.

Water workouts also incorporate resistance training, which keeps you from losing muscle and strength as you age. Water's resistance strengthens your muscles as you push against it. Simply walking in water, using correct posture, will work your abdominal muscles.

The clinic recommends many different kinds of water activities.

Water walking – in any direction – can be done slowly or quickly, using long or short strides. Water running, which requires flotation devices, is especially useful for stress fractures or as cross training for runners.

Water aerobics, strength and flexibility training, and rehabilitation exercises are also very effective, although the clinic suggests you start with a class in order to learn the moves correctly, and to choose an instructor certified in cardiopulmonary resuscitation and trained in water safety.

Specially designed equipment can add variety to, and increase the intensity of, your workout. Some of the clinic's suggestions include flotation belts, which keep you upright and provide back support while walking or jogging in deep water; swim goggles; face mask and snorkel; resistance equipment such as barbells and weighted boots; webbed gloves to provide extra resistance for strength building; and water shoes.

Be sure to tell the instructor if you have a medical condition that might affect your workout.

For more information, visit the Mayo Clinic's Web site at www.mayoclinic.com.

As Germany agrees to funding, liberal Jews fight for recognition

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — A long-simmering internecine Jewish battle in Germany is boiling over. Saying they have been shut out of official Jewish life, progressive Jews in Germany have intensified efforts to gain recognition and funding with a plea to Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder.

In a letter released at a Jerusalem press conference Jan. 7, Uri Regev, executive director of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, urged the German leader "to address the needs and the entitlements of the Union der Progressiven Juden in Deutschland and the communities and institutions it represents."

There has been no response from the government to the letter, said Shmuel Bahagon, executive director of the Union for Progressive Judaism in Germany (UPJG).

The fight highlights a battle between liberal Judaism and Germany's traditional Jewish officials in the world's fastest-growing Jewish community.

The letter comes as Schroeder prepares to sign a historic contract with the Central Council of Jews in Germany (CCJG), pledging $3 million (US) in annual support for the Jewish community. The signing is slated for Jan. 27, Holocaust Memorial Day in Germany.

The established Jewish community is celebrating the pending federal contract, but UPJG representatives are crying foul because the deal doesn't explicitly include the Progressive movement, which also needs funding to support programs and attract new members, Regev said.

"The anticipated contract has to make explicit reference to the Progressive Union and the communities affiliated with it," his letter says.

But CCJG President Paul Spiegel said the council includes all streams of Judaism, so there is no need to specify movements. He said the council wouldn't exclude any group from membership – and therefore funding – as long as its members are halachically Jewish.

Spiegel said an application for membership in the CCJG by a progressive congregation in Lower Saxony will be considered at its board's next meeting. "We have to be convinced – as always – that the members of these communities are Jews, based on halachah."

The letter to Schroeder is part of a three-pronged battle in which the World Union (with some 2 million members), its German affiliate and American Reform Jewry are pressuring the German government and the German Jewish establishment that they say refuses to accept them.

Some observers see the battle as long overdue, heralding the return of liberal Judaism to the country of its birth. The Reform movement has its roots in mid-19th century Germany.

But critics see a small group trying to establish itself outside the CCJG umbrella and claim state funding for religious groups. They say a split is destructive and unnecessary, as long as the Progressive movement's members meet traditional standards of "who is a Jew."

The CCJG, created after World War II, is designed to be inclusive. But unlike in North America, it only covers those defined as Jewish according to Jewish law. Most European Progressive movements abide by matrilineal descent, but their policies on conversion to Judaism do not meet Jewish legal standards.

Though it does not accept non-Jews as members, the Progressive movement encourages non-Jewish spouses and children to participate in religious life in order to bring them toward full membership as converts, a spokesperson said.

There are about 2,000 members in 15 Progressive Union congregations in Germany, a spokesperson said. Excluding members of the Progressive Union, there are 100,000 Jews in Germany and 83 congregations serving them.

In 2002, the Progressive Union in Germany tested the courts, with as-yet-inconclusive results. A congregation in the former East German city of Halle, which belongs to the Progressive Union but chose not to join the Central Council, sued for a share of state subsidies distributed by the council. The congregation did not seek arbitration with the Central Council before suing.

In February 2002, the high court sent the claim back to a lower court to decide whether this was a religious group worthy of state funding and to determine whether the claim was purely financial.

No decision has been reached.

In recent weeks, leaders of the World Union and the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, have pressed their case in Germany's U.S. consulates and its embassies in Washington, D.C., and Tel Aviv. They have been told Germany is sympathetic, but does not get involved with the internal affairs of religious groups.

A new foundation is raising funds to restore the Weissensee Cemetery in the former East Berlin, the largest Jewish cemetery in Europe with 115,000 graves on 103 acres.

Opened in 1880, it has been largely abandoned since the Nazis shut it down and has suffered wear from time and nature. The Friends of the Jewish Cemetery Berlin-Weissensee needs nearly $4 million (US) "just to fix the stones that are falling down," said chair Michael Mamlock, 51, a Berliner whose late parents survived the Holocaust in hiding.

With the German and Berlin governments and Germany's Jewish community short of cash, the foundation is seeking funds. Mamlock hopes the cemetery will eventually be listed as a UNESCO Cultural Heritage Site, which would bring annual financial support.

Hall-of-Fame coach a real football innovator

CJN News Services

Sid Gillman was a football innovator whose ideas are still current 48 years after he began his coaching career in the professional game. The legendary coach and member of the Football Hall of Fame died Jan. 3 at age 91.

Gillman is best known for developing the West Coast Offence, the high-powered passing attack that was subsequently used to great effect by the Bill Walsh-coached San Francisco 49ers teams of the 1980s and '90s.

Rather than running with the ball, the system emphasized passing – Gillman's passion – by spreading the field out vertically and horizontally to open up space. Joe Montana and Steve Young, the 49ers' star quarterbacks, used the offence to win the Super Bowl on five occasions. The St Louis Rams – who won the Super Bowl in 2000 and reached the championship game again last season, losing to the New England Patriots – also credit Gillman with influencing their attack.

Gillman was also one of the first coaches to prepare for games by analyzing film footage. The family's garage in Carlsbad, just north of San Diego, where he lived before moving north to Century City 18 months ago, was full of dozens of reels of film and videotapes, as well as binders full of football plays and philosophies. Working with film came naturally to Gillman – his family operated movie theatres in Minneapolis and he was comfortable with projection equipment.

In his first coaching job at Denison (Ohio) University in 1935, he saw an advertisement for a 35mm projector for $35. His wife, Esther, said they couldn't afford it, but Gillman insisted.

"That was the beginning," she said. "He would come home, we would put up a white sheet on the wall, Sid would show me these films."

Gillman played college football for Ohio State and one season as a professional with the Cleveland Rams before turning down other offers to concentrate on coaching. He enjoyed considerable success at the college level. As head coach at Miami University in Oxford, Ohio, and at the University of Cincinnati, he compiled a combined record of 81 wins, 19 losses and two ties between 1944 and 1954.

Moving into the professional game, he coached the Los Angeles Rams from 1955 to 1959, winning a division title in his first season, but he was fired after four years. He considered becoming a stockbroker but was persuaded to give coaching another shot by Barron Hilton, the owner of a new AFL franchise, the Los Angeles Chargers. Gillman coached them for the first 10 years of their existence, first in Los Angeles then in San Diego. Between 1960 and 1969, then again in 1971, he brought them five division titles and one league championship. He later coached the Houston Oilers. In an 18-year pro-coaching career, he compiled a record of 123 wins, 104 losses and seven ties.

Sid Gillman

His last coaching job was a three-year stint with the Philadelphia Eagles as an assistant to Dick Vermeil. Vermeil, who later took St Louis to their two Super Bowls and became a close family friend, said the Eagles would never have made it to the 1980 Super Bowl had it not been for Gillman.

Gillman was inducted into the Pro Football Hall of Fame in 1983 and was also a member of the National Football Hall of Fame.

"He was way ahead of his time in organization, in the passing game and offensive football," said Al Davis, who worked under Gillman with the Chargers before becoming a rival coach, and managing general partner, with the Oakland Raiders.

"In the '60s, the passing game was not yet really developed," Davis said. "Certainly the Chargers were the flagship for all teams to follow, all teams to emulate. Being part of Sid's organization was like going to a laboratory for the highly developed science of professional football."

Gillman is survived by his wife, four children, eight grandchildren and three great-grandchildren.

Raptors release former Israeli league star

The Toronto Raptors terminated the contract of Nate Huffman last week after the former Israeli league all-star missed 32 of the Raptor's first 39 games.

The Raptors claimed Huffman breached his contract "by failing to disclose material facts regarding his medical condition. Huffman failed to disclose his history of knee problems. Had those injuries been disclosed as required, the club would not have entered into the contract."

A spokesperson for the NBA Players Association suggested the Raptors' move could result in a grievance leading to arbitration.

Huffman underwent arthroscopic surgery on his right knee during the preseason. He returned on Dec. 8. In his seven games with the Raptors, Huffman averaged 3.3 points, 3.3 rebounds and 10.9 minutes.

In a recent interview with the college paper from his former school, Central Michigan, Huffman said his knee was continuing to flare up with fluid, leaving him in pain.

Though he signed a three-year, $5.1 million (US) contract, he never lived up to the Raptors' high expectations.

In Israel, however, Huffman was a go-to guy. In 2001, playing with Maccabi Elite Tel Aviv, he was named MVP of the Israeli Basketball League as well as the Suproleague. Basket News magazine named him Best American Player in Europe in 2001.

Huffman, 27, who is not Jewish, was recruited to Maccabi after playing one year in Spain. In his three years in Israel, the 7-1 centre led Maccabi to two Israeli national championships while becoming a fan favourite and earning millions of dollars in the process.

He told his college paper that he stayed in Israel until this season, even while being courted by various NBA teams in order to be financially secure before he left. "I decided to play three years there because it seemed like every year I would double my salary,' he said. "Another reason… was to win a championship."

Huffman accepted his reduced role with the Raptors and enjoyed being able to relax without fans disturbing him. Nevertheless, he said, "I miss the fame and the spotlight, but it does get annoying. I wouldn't be in the position I am today without fans who adored me and appreciated my game and what I was able to do in Israel."

In Toronto, however, sports talk shows questioned his ability even when he was healthy, with some knowledgeable commentators suggesting he was a "project" who might never develop into an NBA-calibre player. Other reports said teammates thought he was too cocky, considering he had never played in the NBA before.

Where does Shabbat fit?

20 something

By JODI KOVITZ

A twentysomething friend of mine from Vancouver has lived away from her family for some time. She is about to move to a new Canadian city – alone – in order to advance her career. She recently told me that what keeps her grounded is lighting her Shabbat candles every Friday night. Through practising this single weekly Shabbat ritual, she feels connected to her family and creates a sense of home, wherever she may be.

Another twentysomething friend of mine who is currently completing his graduate work recently shared his perspective on Shabbat with me. He has developed and enjoyed deep connections to his family, particularly his grandparents who were Holocaust survivors, through his family's regular Friday-night Shabbat dinners. In fact, the ritual of "making Shabbat dinner" became so important to him as a young adult that he chose to make weekly Shabbat dinners with his roommates while away at university as an undergraduate student.

When I was living in Milan, Italy, on an exchange program several years ago, I first experienced Shabbat as an opportunity for renewal. I had been away for six months, and I was feeling homesick. I decided to go to Florence, Italy, to make Shabbat dinner with a close friend and attend a Shabbat service in the old synagogue there. Sitting amid a small group of strangers, humming along to tunes I did not recognize, I felt complete. Through taking the time to enjoy Shabbat, I discovered the importance of taking time to renew. Further, I learned how uplifting a sense of belonging to a community can be.

Through my experience in Milan and many Friday-night dinners with my family, I have experienced the holiness of Shabbat in my own way. As I develop my Jewish identity, I ask myself, is it OK that I do not keep Shabbat in the strict sense? Does it somehow make me any less of a Jew to see Shabbat as a guiding principle that is there when I need it rather than a law?

From my liberal perspective, it is perfectly fine that I enjoy Shabbat in the way that I do. I am affiliated with Judaism in a way that I feel comfortable with, and that is OK. My concept of Shabbat can evolve as I do. However, I have learned that, from a more Orthodox perspective, in order to acknowledge Shabbat and hence live by the required Jewish law, we either keep Shabbat or we don't – there isn't really much of an in-between position.

I have trouble resolving these competing belief systems as I attempt to figure out where I fit into the Jewish community. However, these kinds of discrepancies force us to constantly question the rituals, explore our own values and grow as a result.

The place of Shabbat in our lives will obviously be different for each of us. Regardless of how we individually observe, it seems to teach us about the sanctity of time, the value of community and family and the stability that tradition can create for us throughout our ever-evolving lives.

What I find interesting is that I know many Jews in their twenties, including myself, who turn to Oprah or self-help books for tips on how to cope with the stress and pressure that inevitably come with being twentysomething.

Wouldn't observing Shabbat seem like a healthy, inexpensive and obvious way to reduce our stress and spend time connecting with ourselves?

Perhaps, but I think we are a generation of searchers, and having the answer right in front of us from the day we were given our Hebrew names would be too easy.

I welcome your feedback at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

TU B'SHEVAT FRUITY CHICKEN

1 large onion	juice of 1 lemon
1 tblsp. oil	2 cups vegetable broth or water
1 chicken, quartered	1 cup pitted prunes
1/4 tsp. ground ginger	1 cup dried apricots
1/2 tsp. cinnamon	1 cup roasted, unsalted almonds
1/4 cup apricot jam	(½ cup chopped coarsely, ½ cup whole)
1 cup orange juice	salt and pepper to taste

Chop onion and saute in oil in large pot until soft, but not browned. Remove skin and fat from chicken. While onion is cooking, mix ginger and cinnamon and sprinkle on chicken pieces. When onion is finished, place chicken in pot, and brown on all sides. Add all other ingredients, reserving 1/2 cup whole almonds for garnish. Cook over low heat for at least 40 minutes, adding more broth if necessary. Add salt and pepper. Serve with rice and garnish with remaining almonds. Serves 4-6.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

We didn't need the Quebecois of the '70s to teach us about the importance of language in determining and preserving cultural identity. If anything, we might have taught them a few lessons on the subject. I remember that soon after Bill 101 was passed, a certain rabbi in Montreal made a commitment to speak only Yiddish in public! I also fondly remember interviewing a Jewish woman from Uzbekistan who told me that the day her boss told her the factory's language was switching from Russian to Uzbeki was the day she registered to study Hebrew at an ulpan.

As a people, we have an ancient tradition of veneration for the Hebrew language. It expresses itself in a midrash/legend on the preservation of our native language through centuries of slavery in Egypt. It manifests itself in a mystical appreciation of every letter of the holy tongue. It's difficult to get excited about a "K," but you can easily wax poetic on every little nuance of the aleph or the gimmel.

My favourite example of our deep respect for Hebrew and its power is a wonderful custom that existed both in eastern Europe and in North Africa. Jewish babies were given Hebrew letters cut from wood to play with, but they were dipped in honey so that from infancy, Jewish children would know how sweet the language can be. In a country such as Morocco, where the majority spoke in a dialect without a written form (Moroccan Arabic), Hebrew letters were used in transliteration to help non-Jewish neighbours send letters and keep records.

Jewish schools (and even some camps) around the world have made a serious commitment to the study and use of Hebrew. Many Canadian Jewish schools have a loyalty to Ivrit b'Ivrit. While there are valid questions about the amount of Hebrew taught, the type of Hebrew desired (textual, spoken Israeli, a hybrid, etc.), and the subjects which should be taught in Hebrew (history, Talmud, math, gym??!!), most Jewish educators are in agreement that the more Hebrew a Jew knows, the more comfortable he/she will be in identifying positively as a Jew.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Is Jewish population declining?

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Has Canada's Jewish population declined?

Yes, says one expert, although not so dramatically that the community should worry that it's shrinking.

No, says another authority, arguing that, in fact, Canadian Jewry is likely growing.

The opposing views were sounded amid last week's release of numbers from the 2001 census on Canadians' ethnic origins.

Experts differ on census data

Apart from showing how ethnically diverse Canada has become – with more than 18 per cent of Canadians born elsewhere and the proportion of visible minorities soaring – the census revealed a drop in the number of people who declared themselves Jewish by ethnicity or culture.

The census found 348,605 respondents across Canada who claimed to have Jewish ethnic origins – a drop of about one per cent over the 1996 mini-census and more than five per cent compared to the 1991 census.

"A decline of 3,000 people [over the 1996 census] is not very alarming, but it's still a decline," University of Toronto sociologist Robert Brym, a longtime watcher of Jewish demographics, told The CJN. "There are no longer huge sources of immigration, and Jewish fertility rates are fairly stable."

Harper criticizes Liberals on Israel

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

As new individuals assume the leadership of the federal political parties, The CJN intends to interview them all.

In a recent interview with The Canadian Jewish News, Canadian Alliance leader Stephen Harper made it clear that, if elected as this country's next prime minister, his party would adopt a stronger stance on foreign policy issues. Harper criticized what he refers to as the Liberal party's "moral neutrality" in foreign policy, citing the pending conflict with Iraq as one glaring example. He said his party would follow a "value-oriented" foreign policy agenda, which would see Canada forging closer ties with its western allies, including Israel.

Stephen Harper

Indeed, the 43-year-old Opposition leader emphasized his party's support for the state of Israel, which he views as a member of the western democratic family. It is this message that the Canadian Alliance is taking to the Jewish community, parts of which have been disaffected by the Liberal party's policy toward Israel and the Middle East.

In a talk with The CJN, Harper elaborated on a number of other issues, ranging from his party's views on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to the Alliance's domestic policy priorities.

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Director

TORONTO — Adam Fuerstenberg, a retired professor of English at Ryerson University, has been named director of UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto. A child survivor of the Holocaust, Fuerstenberg served until recently as head of the federation's committee for Yiddish. He succeeds Carol Anne Reed, who is now on faculty at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education of the University of Toronto.

CHAT Gets Grant

TORONTO — The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto announced it has received a "substantial" Judaic Preparatory Grant from the AVI CHAI Foundation, one of 60 awarded for 2002-2003. The grant will support its "New Stream" Judaic studies program for students who have not attended a Jewish day school. Of CHAT's 1,424 students, 166 are in the new stream. AVI CHAI is a New York-based foundation established in 1984 to support Jewish learning.

ISRAEL

Tourney of Terror

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority has named teams in a soccer tournament after suicide bombers and other "heroes" of the intifadah. The tournament, and a team, have been named for Abdel Baset Odeh, who carried out last year's bombing of a Passover seder at a hotel in Netanya that killed 30 people, the Jerusalem Post reported last week. The other six teams have been named for terrorists from Tulkarem, where the tourney is taking place under PA auspices. Odeh's brother was to hand out the trophy to the winning team.

Israelis Travel Less

JERUSALEM — Some 3.25 million Israelis travelled abroad last year, a drop of eight per cent from 2001. It was the first time in 10 years that travel abroad fell, Israel Radio said last week. In contrast, there was a 10 per cent increase in domestic hotel stays by Israelis.

Sbarro Sentencing

JERUSALEM — An Israeli military court has sentenced two Palestinians to 15 life terms plus 25 years in connection with a suicide bombing at the Sbarro pizzeria in Jerusalem in August 2001 that killed 15 people. The pair were convicted of hiding the suicide bomber and the explosives, and smuggling them from Ramallah to Jerusalem, Ha'aretz reported.

WORLD

Rabbi Sentenced

CAMDEN, N.J. — A New Jersey rabbi was sentenced Jan. 16 to life in jail for hiring two men to kill his wife. Capping a nine-year drama, the sentence followed Rabbi Fred Neulander's conviction last November for murder and conspiracy to commit murder in the death of his wife, Carol. He sat silently as her three siblings took turns describing him as a cold, narcissistic, selfish killer of a loving and caring person.

Suspected Nazis in Oz

SYDNEY — The Australian government has given the Lithuanian government a list of nine alleged Nazi war criminals currently living in Australia. The move came after Lithuania sent Australia in 2001 a list of 22 Nazi-era war crime suspects who were believed to have emigrated to Australia after the war. No charges have been laid against the nine.

Wolfowitz Weighs In

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A senior Pentagon official said the Bush administration will focus on Israeli settlements and a Palestinian state as soon as an anticipated war against Iraq is over. In recent comments to the Washington Post, U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz said, "Our stake in pushing for a Palestinian state will grow" after the war, and said he preferred "concrete steps, like dealing with the settlements" over the advancement of diplomacy. Wolfowitz is considered a hawk and strongly pro-Israel. He also said Israel must be kept out of any U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

Pearl Memorials

LOS ANGELES — Interfaith memorial services are being planned in four cities, including Jerusalem, to commemorate the one-year anniversary of the murder of journalist Daniel Pearl. The events sponsored by the Daniel Pearl Foundation will also take place between Feb. 20-Feb. 24 in Los Angeles, Toronto and New York. Pearl, a Wall Street Journal reporter, was kidnapped Jan. 23, 2002, in Pakistan by Islamic terrorists who killed him a month later.

Arson at Ottawa Jewish Library

OTTAWA — An Ottawa police hate crimes officer and the local arson unit are investigating a recent fire at the Jewish Youth Library in a residential area of the city's west end.

The fire was set about 3:30 a.m. on Jan. 19 near the back wall of the two-storey building, triggering smoke detectors inside that alerted police and firefighters.

Police estimate the damage, which was largely confined to the building's exterior, at $10,000.

Lead police investigator Mike Harbosch told CBC last week it was too early to tell if the fire was a hate crime.

Investigators believe an accelerant, such as gasoline, was likely used. Both police and firefighters reported smelling gas at the scene, CBC reported.

"Obviously it's a highly suspicious act that could very well be a hate crime," Mitchell Bellman, executive director of the Ottawa Jewish Community Council, told the Ottawa Citizen. "It's something we would take... very seriously."

Given the 8,000-volume library's residential location, "someone would really have had to scout us out," library co-director Devora Caytak told the Citizen. "There's just a small brown sign. We're on a dead-end street. It doesn't look like a building, it looks like a house."

CBC president defends Mideast coverage

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) president Robert Rabinovitch defended the network, and Mideast correspondent Neil Macdonald in particular, against accusations of anti-Israel bias during a panel discussion last week at the YM-YWHA.

To the applause of the more than 400 people present, a woman in the audience began a question-and-answer session by saying she is "ashamed" of the CBC and that Macdonald's news reports "make my blood boil."

She said the CBC's coverage of the Middle East is especially troubling because the network is headed by a Jew. "I don't understand how liberal Jews like you can be so against Israel."

Rabinovitch, who was chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec region executive until his appointment as CBC's president and chief executive officer in November 1999, responded that CBC News is world-renowned for its fairness and said he respects its journalists.

"Our job is to put out the information in its bold, ugly form, and I'm sorry if you do not agree with that," said Rabinovitch.

He was moderating a panel discussion on Jewish participation in Quebec's political life turned into a discussion of the CBC's Mideast coverage during the question period. The panel followed a satellite broadcast from New York with U.S. presidential hopeful Joseph Lieberman.

Rabinovitch said he realizes some "do not like [Macdonald's] way of speaking, it turns people off," but he upheld Macdonald's professional integrity.

Please see related story on page 31

He said Macdonald was among the first to report that Palestinian allegations of a massacre in Jenin by Israeli troops were groundless. Moreover, Rabinovitch said, most of what Macdonald reports can be found in Israeli newspapers.

"I am impressed by his intelligence and the work he does," Rabinovitch said. "Those who have met him in the Jewish community understand he sees the problem from both sides [of the conflict]. I believe he does an exceptional job."

Rabinovitch said CBC journalists try to "ferret out the truth and present the information in a fair and balanced way" and said he is confident that is being done by the network's three correspondents in the Middle East.

Journalists are only "as good as the information they get," he said, adding that he gets as many complaints from the Arab community as he does from the Jewish community about CBC's Mideast coverage. He advised those with complaints to contact the network's ombudsman.

Rabinovitch also read an editorial by Amos Schocken, the publisher of the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, that argued the newspaper has a duty to bring its readers stories about the reality of the Israeli occupation and its effect on millions of Palestinians, even if Israelis would rather not hear the truth. This knowledge, the publisher argues, is in the best interest of Israelis because it will better enable them to make decisions about their future.

Panellist Robert Libman, a member of the City of Montreal's executive committee, said he was not satisfied by CBC news editor-in-chief Tony Burman's recent explanations of why the term "terrorist" is seldom applied to the network's reports on Palestinian suicide and other attacks on Israeli civilians. Burman was responding to charges by columnist Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel, that the CBC deliberately avoids using the term.

(Rabinovitch said it was Spector who pulled out of a planned televised debate on the issue when CBC decided to broaden the format from a one-on-one with Burman to a panel including Macdonald and "any representative" of the Canada-Israel Committee.)

Libman, a former executive director of B'nai Brith Canada, Quebec region, said he doubted that journalists can avoid being swayed by personal feelings and suggested "subliminal anti-Semitism" may be at work in some Middle East coverage.

Libman also wondered if Rabinovitch, "as a Jew, is bending over backwards to show he is impartial... do[ing] everything he can to go in the opposite direction."

Rabinovitch did not respond to Libman's remark.

A remarkable document

From the editor's desk

In our effort to countermand the campaign being waged in certain academic and other quarters around the world to isolate Israeli authors and scholars, The CJN uses this space in the last issue of each month to highlight an Israeli author and his work.

* * *

Last May in Jerusalem, the head of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), Sallai Meridor, announced the creation of The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute.

In the context of a world in which the Jewish people, physically and spiritually, seemed suddenly more vulnerable, the creation of the institute was a precedent-setting, visionary initiative.

The institute's aim is ambitious. It is "to examine the challenges and the threats facing the Jewish people" as well as the concomitant "needs pertaining to our safety, continuity and prosperity."

To a Jew in North America, terms of reference for a policy planning institute that include "safety" may sound quite incongruous. But to our co-religionists in Europe, South America and Israel, of course, it is their very first concern.

The chair of the institute's board of directors is Dennis Ross, the director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy and the former U.S. Mideast special envoy.

As the first founding president of the institute, the leaders of JAFI wisely selected Hebrew University professor emeritus Yehezkel Dror.

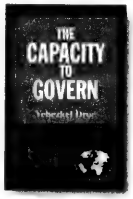
Dror is widely recognized as one of the world's foremost thinkers, planners and designers of public policy. He has organized and led workshops and seminars for senior politicians and public servants in more than 40 countries in policy and governmental planning.

It was therefore an act of compelling logic when the executive board of the Club of Rome in the early 1990s, asked Dror to "prepare a report analyzing the root causes of the incapacities of governments to fulfill their responsibilities and suggesting how governance might be improved and enabled to cope with the global transformations under way."

The Club of Rome is an independent international think-tank founded in 1968. Its mission is to act as "a global catalyst of change that is free of any political, ideological or business interest." Dror is the only Israeli member of the august body.

His initial report was submitted in 1994. After a series of discussions and reviews, the final version, with the full imprimatur of the Club of Rome, was published in 2001 as The Capacity to Govern.

Dror's work is breathtaking. Its scope is trans-national, trans-cultural, trans-geographical. It is also multi-disciplined, calling upon the fields of political theory, psychology, philosophy, anthropology, sociology and literature.



The book begins from the proposition that all prevailing forms of governance (democracies and non-democracies, though not to the same degrees) are increasingly unable to perform changing crucial functions. "Radical redesign of governance," Dror boldly writes, "is required; otherwise, increasing social costs, even existence-threatening failures, are unavoidable."

The book is divided into three parts: The Problematic, the diagnosis of the problem; Redesign Requirements, a short two-chapter bridging section that carries the reader from the diagnosis to part three, the proposed prescription, which Dror calls The Resolution.

The key characteristics of the work are its scholarship, intellectual sweep and daring propositions.

Dror has included nearly 30 pages of references and notations for further reading. The book is a riveting, graduate school-level seminar in combined political theory, philosophy and public policy.

Despite Dror's wide canvas of differing governmental systems and cultures, and despite the authoritativeness of his voice, he writes with a sense of humility, never ethnocentric, always sensitive to locally appropriate solutions that regard the history and unique circumstances of the place, people and institutions of the particular problem at hand.

Perhaps one of the most remarkable aspects of the book is the fact that it is unabashedly rooted in uncompromising idealism.

"The single most important – and also most radical and difficult – change required in governance," Dror writes, "is to make it more moral, above all in the sense of increasingly serving ever higher conceptions of raison d'humanité, with special attention to values concerning the future. This is both a moral imperative and an essential basis for engaging well in weaving the future."

Herein lies the novelty and daring of Dror's work. He develops the ground-breaking notion of raison d'humanité. It is the super-arching justification for the need to improve the quality of governments around the world. He minces no words, spares no sentiment. Everyone in senior decision-making positions of governance falls under his idealistic, ethical swath. Dror even proposes a hard-hitting, 14-point Code of Ethics for senior politicians, which, alas, most of our parliamentarians would fail.

Urgency and hope permeate Capacity to Govern. The desire to "weave a better future" for all humanity has driven Dror to write this seminal work. The book, which should be read and taught in both high school and university, is ultimately an eloquent statement of profound belief in humankind. MBD

Russian immigration has helped Israel: expert

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

While the results are mixed, the overall impact of Russian immigration to Israel has been positive, says a leading Israeli scholar.

Wolf Moskovich, a professor in the department of Russian and Slavic studies at Hebrew University, explained in a lecture last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation that Israel's economy, defence forces and cultural institutions have all benefited a great deal from the wave of Russian immigrants.

"In general, nothing better happened to Israel in the last 20 years than this mass Russian immigration," said Moskovich, who moved to Israel from Russia in 1974.

"It enriched Israel in many ways, mainly by the [influx] of Jewish brains."

Speaking about the one million Russian émigrés who have come to Israel since 1989, Moskovich cited some statistics to indicate the magnitude of the Russians' contributions to Israeli society.

He said Russians account for:

- 30 per cent of Israeli soldiers;
- 25 per cent of Israel's primary and secondary school teachers;
- 80 per cent of Israeli musicians;
- 50 per cent of physicians in out-patient clinics; and
- 90 per cent of professional athletes.

Moskovich explained that 50 per cent of the Russians attained higher education in Russia, a major reason for their high skill levels.

Although he emphasized the positives, Moskovich said a number of problems have arisen in Israel as a result of the huge Russian influx.

"There was created in Israel a separate world of Russian culture," Moskovich said.

With North American-style multiculturalism becoming widely accepted in Israel, Russian institutions, from radio stations to social clubs, have flourished.

As a result, "[an immigrant] who doesn't want to belong to Israeli society can belong to Russian society," Moskovich said.

While likely comforting for the new arrivals, this phenomenon has drawn scorn from other ethnic groups and kept some Russians alienated from other parts of Israeli society, Moscovich said.

Sephardi Jews, in particular, say they experienced more of a melting pot absorption policy when they came to Israel in previous waves of immigration and complain that the Russians have received the "aliyah deluxe" while Sephardim received worse treatment, he said.

"They [Sephardim] say they didn't get the same compensation as [the] Russians [did] when they came in the 1950s."

There is also the contentious issue of some Russians not being considered halachically Jewish and of some not being Jewish at all.

While well-known Russian immigrant MK Natan Sharansky was recently quoted as saying that 142,000 Russian immigrants are not Jews, Moskovich said the "real figures are much higher."

Moskovich said about eight per cent of Russian immigrants leave Israel, with two per cent returning to their countries of origin and the remainder seeking greener pastures in the West.

Russians currently make up one-fifth of Israel's population and have a great deal of influence on Israeli politics, he said.

"As far as I can see, the Russians will be one of the decisive elements in Sharon's victory," Moskovich predicted.

Moscovich's talk was the Shoshana Shier Memorial Lecture.

Husband & wife shed combined 69 lbs.!

Joann Knott was on and off diets for more than 20 years. She attended weight loss meetings religiously. She turned to prescription and over-the-counter diet pills. Over the years she became a self-confessed yo-yo dieter.

"I've been on more diets that I can name," remembers the office manager and mother of two adult children. "My weight frightened me, but even that wouldn't stop me from snacking all evening long."

When Joann's husband, Bob, started packing on the pounds, he also attempted losing weight with diets and fads. "I suffered through tasteless shakes and frozen meals," laments the 6'1" supervisor. "I'd yo-yo up and down and eventually gain all my weight back, plus more."

For many of us, weight loss feels like a relentless struggle. Easy access to fast and processed foods makes shedding unwanted pounds even tougher. Even with the most sincere commitment to dieting, we seem to quickly fall into old eating habits.

Dr. Patrick Porter, founder of Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres, explains. "The average diet lasts 72 hours. This is because the subconscious mind has formed deep-seated habits that are stronger than will power. Combine these complex habits with a stressful lifestyle and emotional ties to food, and we understand why more than 95% of dieters fail over the long haul."

BEFORE

Why Hypnosis Works

Our minds work on two levels: conscious and subconscious. We make decisions, think, and act with the conscious mind. The subconscious controls the automatic body functions, like our heartbeat and breathing, and it also controls our habits. In hypnosis, the conscious mind becomes subdued while the subconscious becomes more aware. Positive suggestions given by the hypnotist are readily accepted. Porter explains, "When we engage the subconscious, new habits feel easy, effortless and automatic, so will power is not required. This is the beauty of hypnosis."

To inspire lasting weight loss, Positive Changes' hypnotists work with the subconscious to help people think and eat the way naturally thin people do.

Hypnosis Changes Lives

"When we started the program, we didn't know what to expect," said Bob. "I noticed a change in my behaviour from the first week. I immediately quit drinking pop and snacking. I melted off 45 pounds in 10 weeks and dropped eight inches from around my waist. Hypnosis put me back in control of my eating, and it feels great."

AFTER

Joann was utterly amazed by the ease with which she shed her unwanted pounds. "I had almost given up on ever losing weight," said Joann. "I used food as a crutch. Thanks to hypnosis, I don't need that crutch anymore. Hypnosis eliminated my food cravings, evening binges, and poor eating habits. I dropped 24 pounds in three months. My dress size is now a slender size 8!"

The Knotts are experiencing the physical benefits daily, and their physicians are impressed. "My doctor recently checked my cholesterol," said Joann. "It had dropped by 30 points. Bob's cholesterol has also improved and we think he'll soon be able to get off his blood pressure medication altogether."

Space shuttle science: successfully seeking sprites

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Scientists have captured rare pictures of elves and sprites – "luminous events" that occur above the level of thunderstorms – as part of the research project being overseen by Israel's first astronaut, Ilan Ramon, on the space shuttle Columbia.

In a telephone press conference last Monday, four days after takeoff, Yoav Yair, speaking from NASA's flight station in Greenbelt, Md., described the "exquisite [video] images" downloaded from the shuttle for scientific study. It was the first time such images were recorded with a calibrated instrument, he said.

Elves, he explained, are electrical phenomena that appear as glowing red light in the shape of a doughnut 85 to 95 kilometres above a thunderhead and spread to a radius of about 300 kilometres. They were discovered only nine years ago and have previously been observed from aircraft, he added. The word "elves" is a loose acronym referring to emissions of light and very low frequency perturbations.

Sprites, which look like "giant red jellyfish with tendrils extending down 80 to 100 kilometres," were first noted in 1989 and last less than one-thousandth of a second. "One has to be very lucky to catch [the short-lived events]," Yair said. "This was our first orbit to hunt for sprites and – bingo! – we nailed one… You can do a lot of good science out of it."

The Mediterranean Israeli Dust Experiment (MEIDEX), a project of Tel Aviv University, is "already exceeding our wildest expectations," said Yair, who is affiliated with the Open University of Israel. "We've recorded a huge amount of data."

He noted that his colleagues on the project include groups from Stanford University and Israelis in Sde Boker and Mitzpe Ramon.

Although the work has no immediate short-term benefit, said Yair, "in the long term, once you get to understand the mechanisms working in the upper atmosphere, this may have major applications for long-distance communications and orbiting astronauts."

Based on his contact with Ramon, Yair reported that the astronaut seemed relaxed, composed and "enjoying himself immensely."

Joining in from an airplane hangar in Crete, atmospheric physicist Zev Levin – who was Yair's PhD instructor – said he had just flown over the central Mediterranean region in an airplane tracking the path of the shuttle and trying to identify dust clouds, the main objective of the experiment. Although the clouds had not yet been located – this not being the best time of year to look for dust storms – they were able to track pollution coming out of Europe, which could have climatic implications, particularly regarding precipitation. Things were looking better for the end of the week, he said.

Analysis of the data will continue after the 16-day shuttle voyage ends, and preliminary results are expected to be published within the next six months to a year, Levin said.

He explained that the much speedier shuttle passes over his airplane for only one to two seconds at a time. "We can get maybe 50 pictures in the time it passes. We do cross-sections at different altitudes."

Having the airplane as well as the shuttle enables scientists to study images of the same phenomena taken from different angles, Levin said.

Good luck Mr. Layton

Jack Layton, the veteran municipal politician from Toronto won an unambiguously sweeping victory on the first ballot of the federal New Democratic Party's leadership vote last Saturday. We congratulate him on his victory. It is never an easy task to mobilize such broad partisan support in a country as geographically regionalized as ours. That Layton did so with such apparent ease is noteworthy.

His election may reasonably be interpreted as a signal from his party's members that they are seeking a new direction from that in which outgoing leader Alexa McDonough had steered them.

Parliamentary democracy functions best when there is a strong, thoughtful Opposition. The stronger the Opposition, ironically, the stronger, more responsive and responsible the government. Most Canadians will agree, however, that, for nearly a decade, our Parliament has been weak. The government has been called to account more by internal challenges than by Opposition ones.

Over the course of the next few months, as he assumes active control of the party, Mr. Layton will put his own stamp on the party's policies. We urge him to re-evaluate some of the party's reflexive, predictable responses to complicated social, economic and foreign policy issues. Ideology as a guide to problem-solving is appropriate; but ideology as a template, however ill-suited and ill-fitting to the circumstances, is sterile and anathema to sound, rigorous public policy.

Yet, sound, rigorous public policy is the first step in becoming a strong Opposition. All Canadians will wish Mr. Layton well if he can achieve this and, in the process, strengthen our Parliament.

Nearly a great shame

The Middle East Students' Association (MESA) at York University, with the active assistance of some members of CUPE local 3039, nearly succeeded last week in preventing Prof. Daniel Pipes from speaking there. Pipes had been invited to the university some time ago by the Jewish Student Federation (JSF).

Citing concerns for security, the university's administration, at virtually the 11th hour, called in the JSF leadership to suggest that the venue for Pipes' presentation was inappropriate and that the engagement be cancelled. Not willing to be cowed by MESA's bullying or to follow the university's craven acquiescence to MESA, the JSF held its ground. It would not surrender its rights to the bully. There are never any concerns for security when anti-Israel speakers are invited to our campuses, the JSF undoubtedly pointed out to the university's administrators. It is only when pro-Israel spokespersons are invited that security becomes an issue.

In the end, grudgingly, the university did the right thing. It provided an alternate venue on campus for Pipes. But it came very close to perpetrating a great shame upon its students and the community.

We are with you

As a 74-year-old French Canadian whose brothers both served in World War II (I served in the Cold War), I am disgusted by the anti-Jewish diatribes floating across Canada. In particular, I am ashamed at the suspension by the Concordia Student Union of Concordia University Hillel's funding and at the recent anti-Semitic rants of Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew, who said Adolf Hitler "fried" six million Jews because they "would have owned the goddamned world."

My association with the Jewish community dates back to the neighbourhood of Lower Town in pre-World War II Ottawa. I vividly remember a Jewish baker who had three wagons selling and delivering bread. At the end of the day, when his wagons came back, he gave away all his leftover bread to poor families – and there were many – most of them French Canadian. They lined up to receive free bread.

I also remember A.J. Freiman, who ran a big store on Rideau Street. He gave preference to bilingual French Canadian clerks because they could treat all his clients equally. We French Canadians always knew that we would be treated with respect by him, and so we shopped there.

Lower Town in those days was home to many Jewish immigrants, mostly from Russia. They worked hard to succeed and educate their children. Some were ragpickers, but their sons became doctors. One of them treated my parents, and I attribute their long lives to him.

There are endless stories about the generous Jews who came to Canada, who worked hard and educated their children to high levels so that they soon became leaders in the community.

We have lots of respect for Jews since they are tolerant and have made Canada a better place to live.

CBC 1

The arrogance and pomposity exhibited by the CBC in its response to the charges made by the Canada-Israel Committee and Norman Spector, Canada's former ambassador to Israel and the Palestinian territories, that its Mideast reports are biased against Israel should not surprise anyone ("The CIC challenges CBC," "Spector slams CBC's Mideast coverage," CJN, Jan. 9).

This government-supported corporation is just mouthing our own Liberal government's policies. Lest we forget, this government has a dismal, unbalanced record on the Mideast. Only a little arm twisting, some pressure and the fact that the Liberal party was viewed unfavourably in its refusal to put the Lebanese terrorist group Hezbollah on its list of banned terrorist organizations finally forced the party to change that policy. I doubt whether they did it because they wanted to (I still remember Prime Minister Jean Chrétien shaking hands with Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah at the recent Francophonie Summit in Lebanon) or because they held deep-rooted beliefs in the wrongness and injustice of it all.

An analogy would be children who learn from and parrot their parents. As far as I am concerned, the CBC and our government are one and the same. There is a dismal lack of integrity and credible journalism in the media. I won't hold my breath waiting for anything to change. These policies were entrenched long ago. We must keep challenging them and hold them accountable, but we might have to admit that their policies reflect the reality of the disturbing and unsettling times we are living in. So what else is new?

In your cover story "The CIC challenges CBC," CBC Mideast reporter Neil Macdonald is quoted as saying that his job is "to afflict the comfortable and comfort the afflicted" (CJN, Jan. 9). Macdonald should note that journalist and political commentator H.L. Mencken, the author of these words, considered himself not a reporter, but a critic.

Don't generalize term anti-Semitism

The claim that Arabs cannot be anti-Semites since they themselves are Semites is a spurious argument. The term was coined to denote the hatred of Jews, and any attempt to generalize it and make it inclusive of all Semitic nations would create an absurd situation.

We Jews know what anti-Semitism means and, for all their protestations, so do the Arabs.

Researching female teachers

As part of a research project on the history of female teachers in 20th-century Ontario, and in addition to our interviews with retired teachers, we would like to obtain copies of the autobiographies, memoirs or biographies of women who have taught in the province's schools. We also are interested in novels these teachers may have written about teachers and schools.

If you are aware of such material, we would appreciate your bringing it to our attention along with information about how we might purchase or otherwise acquire it.

Conservative synagogues must limit membership to maintain Jewish continuity

By RABBI STEVEN SALTZMAN

From ancient times, the Jewish people have struggled with intermarriage. Our survival demanded that we not give our daughters to their sons nor take their daughters for our sons. Until modern times, we have successfully resisted this temptation. Today, however, many families are touched by intermarriage. I share the very real heartbreak and the suffering of these families. Leaders of congregations whisper arguments of inclusivity: "Should not every Jew, even Jews who have intermarried, be included into our synagogues and made to feel welcome?" Would such a position not heal some of the hurt and ameliorate some of the suffering? My heart moves in that direction, but my head and my tradition tell me otherwise. Any small community that is determined to survive in this powerful North American culture, must at the very least be willing to assert without apology the absolute worth of its traditions and beliefs.

As drawn as I am to the inclusivist position, it is a troubling one. It implies that any Jew, bearing any ideological position, articulating any religious expression, must be embraced by the synagogue. Unfettered inclusivity absolves the community from making value judgments about different religious positions. In an inclusivist world, all positions are of equal value.

Traditional Conservative Judaism rejects radical inclusivity, because it accepts a certain set of norms based on the content of generations of Jewish scholarship and learning. These norms, forged through the lens of history, have boundaries beyond which one can no longer be regarded as part of this system. Yes, traditional Conservative Judaism is an exclusivist system that welcomes all who would abide by its doctrines, and reaches beyond its own borders to educate, to counsel, and to encourage those who are at the periphery to move inward toward the centre. It is my contention and the contention of my congregation that synagogue membership in a traditional Conservative synagogue is incompatible with intermarriage and that even the Jewish spouse ought not be admitted to that membership.

What do we know about mixed-married couples (where one spouse remains non-Jewish), and how do intermarried couples compare to conversionary couples (where the non-Jewish spouse converts to Judaism) and to inmarried couples (where both spouses are born Jewish)?

In a recent study published by the American Jewish Committee entitled "Jewish and Something Else: A Study of Mixed-Married Families," Sylvia Barack Fishman reports the following data which I quote almost verbatim:

• Eighty per cent of mixed-married families incorporate Christian activities into their family life. Sixty-six per cent celebrate Christmas at home and 16 per cent also went to church. Sixty-eight per cent of the Jewish partners in these marriages do not fast on Yom Kippur. In contrast, nine per cent of conversionary families celebrated Christmas and none went to church and almost all fasted on Yom Kippur.

• The study shows that although households with mixed-married couples initially try to create exclusively Jewish observances, they drift increasingly into Christian activities.

• Most non-Jewish male or female spouses in mixed marriages expressed negative attitudes toward conversion. In contrast, Jews by choice often spoke positively about familial pressure to convert.

• Non-Jewish spouses raising Jewish children often found themselves resenting the fact that they had given up their Christmas and other Christian celebrations. In contrast, conversionary households usually felt that they and their households were unambivalently Jewish.

• While many non-Jewish spouses cheerfully participate in their Jewish children's holiday celebrations, a substantial proportion felt increasingly resentful about the fact that their children are growing up in a faith tradition different from theirs.

Prof. Jack Wertheimer of the Jewish Theological Seminary concludes: "To put it bluntly, the overwhelming majority of intermarried families do not appear to want their children to have an unambiguous identification with Judaism. More: dual-religion families… have begun to organize to rebuff those seeking to change them, making it clear that they wish to maintain only limited contact with Jewish institutions, and then only on their own terms. Some go further still, denying the central premise of the outreach movement – namely, that an interfaith family is 'problematic.'"

As a recent letter to the New York Times put it, the true goal is to "celebrate the distinctiveness and authenticity of each faith and the value of nurturing both traditions in a mixed marriage."

Despite this data which suggests that mixed-married couples are not committed to a traditional conservative lifestyle and will never subscribe to its tenets, the hard inclusivists still argue that we should actively seek out mixed-married couples and invite them into our synagogue communities. The soft inclusivists suggest that we can accept the Jewish spouse who may wish to join our congregations and still deny membership to the non-Jewish spouse. After all, should we not work to salvage the connections and strengthen the ties of the children of these marriages, children who may be Jewish?

We should, however, recognize that it is impossible to accept only part of a family into the synagogue. Technically, we can deny membership to the gentile spouse, but at some point in the life of this family, we will still be dealing with the entire family, perhaps, at bar or bat mitzvah, at a wedding and even in death. Today, some Conservative synagogues have special sections for those members who may wish to be burried next to their non-Jewish spouse.

Let us now look at data concerning the children of mixed marriages. Steven Cohen's recent Jewish population study notes that only 25-33 per cent of mixed-married couples say that they are raising their children as Jews (albeit in the context of highly syncretistic religious practices). Sixty-five per cent of these Jewish children of mixed marriages will themselves intermarry. In other words, of the one-third (maximum) of the children who are being raised a Jew by mixed-married parents today, no more than 25 per cent will marry Jews. If so, then less than one in ten of the grandchildren of the mixed-marrieds will identify as Jews and have Jewish spouses.

Cohen concludes that mixed-married couples simply do not represent a particularly good target group for community investment of scarce resources. More to our point, there is no evidence that shows a synagogue can "save" the children of mixed-married couples for Judaism. These children are being raised in dual-religion homes where Christianity and its practices are observed, and until the gentile spouse converts, there simply cannot be an unambivalent commitment to a Jewish home and to Jewish identity.

Beyond the issue of the Jewishness of the children of mixed marriages, I suggest that the acceptance of mixed-married couples will not serve our synagogues well and will not serve the Jewish people well, and for the following reasons.

In a drawing by Gustav Dore, Ruth entreats her mother-in-law, Naomi, to allow her to return with Naomi to her homeland, vowing to accept Naomi's religion and people as her own. It is perhaps the most famous incident of conversion to Judaism in the Bible. (Pictures of the Bible, Gustav Dore, Harbour Press, 1988.)

Firstly, the acceptance of mixed-married couples is a disincentive to conversion. The studies show that once a couple is admitted into membership in a synagogue, there are almost no chances to affect a conversion. But, if we have a goal in accepting mixed-married couples, it is to unite this family as a Jewish family by affecting a conversion. The policy of inclusivenss subverts our purpose. What incentive is there for the non-Jewish spouse to convert once the family is a synagogue member?

Secondly, acceptance of mixed-married couples into synagogue membership can change the culture of a synagogue. Rabbis of congregations may be drawn into presenting Judaism in such a way as to make it more palatable to mixed-marrieds. Instead of preaching and teaching about historic persecution, communal responsibility, Zionism, ethnic ties, rabbis might be tempted to avoid these more difficult subjects and speak more broadly, less specifically emphasizing spiritual journeys, personal faith, and universal ethical ties. In other words, rabbis may promote those teachings within Judaism that speak more about universalism and find it more difficult and more painful to speak about the particular, Jewish peoplehood.

Thirdly, what sort of message do we send to our children by accepting mixed- marrieds into synagogue membership? The mantra of almost every Jewish home is that exogamous marriage is taboo. We say "no, no, no," but then after a child marries a non-Jew, we suddenly switch the message and say, "It's okay, you can join our synagogue?" I am not suggesting we sit shivah for children who marry outside the faith. Quite the contrary: the proper instrument of outreach to mixed-marrieds is in the family, and the extended family ought to work tirelessly to gently convince the non-Jewish spouse to convert. The synagogue, however, need not and ought not validate intermarriage by accepting mixed-marrieds into synagogue membership. How can our youth develop a resistance to interdating and intermarriage when the Jewish community is ever more reluctant to stigmatize intermarriage – and on the contrary, is creating a vast population of lobbyists who favour the elimination of barriers to intermarriage because they themselves are intermarried? The synagogue ought to offer study sessions and counselling opportunities for mixed-marrieds to discuss the possibilities of conversion, but it ought not obliterate the firm boundary between Jew and non-Jew. Inclusiveness is heartwarming, but it comes at a very heavy price.

Fourthly, our response to the issue of intermarriage says something about us. Our response is an act of self-definition. We in the traditional conservative movement believe that the future of the Jewish people is predicated on Jewish families transmitting Jewish values to Jewish children. We cannot prevent intermarriage and we understand the heartbreak that families suffer, but no matter how aggressively we reach out to mixed-marrieds, we don't seem to be able to affect a large number of conversions. The alternative strategy to outreach is inreach. We must build a dynamic core of Jewish families that understand the distinctive life that we, as Jews, are commanded to live. We have set ourselves apart from many of the blandishments of our culture for the sake of distinctive beliefs and values which have come down to us from Sinai. Born Jews and those who have joined themselves to our people through conversion must articulate an even more powerful vision of Judaism, a vision that will attract not only our children but some of those people who stand on the periphery of Jewish life.

In the last few decades, we in the conservative movement have tampered with many of the fundamental constituent elements that make up Judaism. I believe that we have tampered with too many pillars and we have broken too many bricks. We must understand that everything in Judaism is intertwined and when you tamper with one boundary, it affects another. We dare not tamper with the boundary between Jew and gentile. To date, we have assured ourselves that the edifice is strong and that it will stand. Let us keep it strong by seeking conversion whenever possible, but deny membership in our congregations to mixed-married couples including the Jewish spouse.

Good news and bad news

Rabbis are not the only writers of Jewish news and other matters, but one of the major differences between them and most writers is that their title and affiliation seem to prejudice the reader, both positively and negatively. This is understandable, for readers want to know a writer's background, occupation and philosophy so they know where that writer is coming from.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Being a writer myself, I am fully aware that whatever I commit to paper will be viewed through the spectacles of hundreds, even thousands of greatly diverse readers.

Readers of The Canadian Jewish News – a large majority (but not all) of whom are Jews, both affiliated and unaffiliated – are either committed to important causes or floating about on the vast sea of uncertainty.

Aside from this paper, what do most CJN readers read, or rather, what media do they turn to first and foremost, and what do they get from them? They read daily papers and, to a lesser degree, weekly or monthly magazines that frequently drift into the habit of emphasizing bad news. Unfortunately, there seems to be more bad news than stories that give the reader a sense of well-being.

This, unfortunately, mirrors the world at large: there seem to be many more negative matters out there than matters that ennoble and refresh the mind.

An example of negative, one-sided media coverage can be found in the average news report about Israel. The nation is rarely depicted as a uniquely successful democracy in an otherwise dictatorial Middle East and, therefore, its great successes are less well-known than its troubles and shortcomings.

To note Israel's troubles and shortcomings is, of course, right and proper, but I would like to see more positive and helpful reports about the Jewish state as well. For instance, its high educational standards and its emphasis on independent thinking is unique in the Middle East, but also notable compared to other countries' educational standards. A public discussion on why this is so would be enlightening.

But are Jewish readers and Jewish journals different from others? To some degree they are. We have had centuries of persecution and other misfortunes to look back on, and that is what many children grow up to consider the norm in our day as well.

Yet there is more to Jewish history and existence than persecution. I am happy to be a Jew, even though I have experienced persecution. For being truly Jewish means to be enriched by our great heritage and to live a life that benefits us as well as others. In that unique combination dwells the secret of our success as a people for whom education remains an enormously important feature.

A resolution I can keep

With the start of every calendar year comes that ubiquitous flurry of New Year's resolutions. For me, this year has been no exception.

They have ranged from the overly ambitious, such as "I will work out at the gym five times a week and avoid all refined sugars," to the incredibly outrageous (for me), such as "I will keep my room clean and organized in such a manner that I will know exactly where everything is." And though you form the resolutions with the very best of intentions, you know from the start it's only a matter of time before they become neglected in favour of more pressing matters.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

I am beginning to discover that it's the less immediately tangible, more long-term approach that works best for actually seeing those newly minted resolutions right through to the very end. I've always believed that genuine progress isn't achieved in great, sweeping leaps and bounds. It can be just as effective when it comes in small, modest increments.

So amid my stack of grad school applications, bombarding prospective employers with hopeful resumes and keeping track of assignment deadlines that creep up with startling ferocity, I have resolved to find some time for myself – to take a breather from it all, sit down on that proverbial park bench and watch the world go by for a few moments, instead of madly scrambling to stay ahead of everyone else; and to victimize myself with cliched questions that nevertheless hold important answers. Like "What does it all mean?" and "What is important to me?" and perhaps most importantly of all, "Why am I doing this?"

For instance, I needed to ask myself at one point about the purpose of this column. What kind of messages did I want to relay to my readers, and what end results did I hope would emerge? Like my definition of progress, I believe that my mistake lay in seeing "results" as something that only comes at the end. With every column, I hope to create an ongoing discussion about the kinds of things people often take for granted – such as, for instance, one's inherent beliefs.

But as someone with a most decidedly unorthodox (pun intended) Jewish upbringing, I had to decide the point at which I should draw a line between sharing my vision of the world as I saw it, and truly offending someone with a very different set of values.

It's my hope that with time, the distinctiveness of this line will blur, becoming less of a boundary and more of a bridge.

Though Jews are said to share far more than just a common gene pool, it is important to remember – and be accepting of – just how varied the backgrounds of those in the Diaspora, can be.

An amazing documentary I once saw by Vancouver filmmaker Nikila Cole highlighted the richness of Jewish history through her travels to faraway lands such as India, the Philippines and even Norway, where tiny communes of Jews live and celebrate their faith.

Though each tiny population had clung resolutely to its old traditions, they had also embraced a part of the nation in which they resided, which served to mould them into who they were.

As a Canadian Jew of Russian descent, I too fall into this category. I see myself as a mosaic: a creation of many generations of traditions and travels to which I am indebted equally for my existence. At this stage in my life, I cannot pretend to know exactly what it means to be Jewish. But as I said in my inaugural column, the essence of the Jewish identity is that it is not stagnant, nor can it be restricted to any one aspect of the faith.

In the next six months, as I continue to share my thoughts with you in my articles, I hope to learn as much about myself and my readers as you will about yourselves.

I think that a column or article is truly successful when it raises more questions than answers, triggering a process of reflection along the way. Whether as a catalyst or merely a participant, I hope to find the time to engage in more of this process. Now that's a resolution I can keep.

A trip around the world that wasn't far at all

Over the winter break, my dad and I travelled to Thailand. It was my first time in Asia, and I could not have been more excited about the journey.

The first day, wandering through the streets of Bangkok, I was amazed. Thai people, for the most part, don't speak English. All of the street and shop signs are in Thai, and it isn't exactly the kind of language you can pick up easily. Suffice it to say that we felt almost as if we had landed on another planet.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

Not that there was anything wrong with visiting a culture so utterly foreign to me. Having never experienced anything like it simply presented me with a new challenge.

But the funny thing was that on the first day, we quickly came to realize just how small the gap really is.

As we were walking through the Khao San Road area of the city, the backpacker's heaven, my dad pointed out a sign. I turned around to see Hebrew writing.

I had heard about the many Israeli tourists who travel to Thailand, and we had actually been told about an Israeli restaurant that we should visit, but standing there in the midst of food stalls selling everything from jackfruit to fried silkworms, I was caught slightly off guard by restaurant signs in Hebrew advertising schnitzel and falafel.

Of course, we went into Shoshana, the restaurant famous to all Israelis, and ate the best hummus and falafel outside of Jerusalem. But the real thrill was watching the little Thai waitresses converse in Hebrew with the young Israelis who were watching Israeli television on a big screen TV.

At that moment, we hadn't left Thailand, but we did experience a unique morphing of cultures, one I would never have even thought possible if I had not seen it for myself.

I figured that eating at Shoshana, with its Hebrew-speaking Thai waitress, would be my little "Jewish" kick on the trip, but, as it turned out, that episode was just a prelude.

In Chiang Rai, a city in the north, our hotel hosted a huge New Year's Eve party and dinner. As part of the celebration, a band was playing dance tunes from around the world. After a tango, waltz, polka and others, the melody of Havah Nagilah reached my ears. I dragged my dad onto the dance floor, and we saw that a rowdy group of people who were singing, clapping and dancing had replaced the previous, reserved crowd of casual dancers.

It took little more than a second to realize that the dance floor was filled with Israelis. We had found the real party and the ruach was unbelievable. As the song came to an end and the crowd dispersed, I began talking to one of the Israelis in Hebrew. After a brief chat, I quickly returned to my table.

After midnight, the party dissipated quickly, and my dad and I, along with some friends from our tour, went to the hotel lobby to sit and talk.

As I entered the huge foyer, I was quickly called over by a large group of people.

"Are you the girl who speaks Hebrew?" one of the Israelis asked. I said yes, and before I could even blink, they had pulled up a chair and started bombarding me with questions.

My Hebrew was definitely rusty, as I have not used it regularly since day school in Grade 8, but somehow I did not find myself short of words as we conversed.

They asked if I knew any songs, and that was when the party really got started. There we were, sitting in the lobby of this hotel in Chiang Rai, Thailand, one little Jewish girl from Toronto/Halifax and a group of middle-aged Israelis, just singing and singing.

To say my New Year's Eve was unique does not even begin to describe it. I find it crazy to think that, with everything going on in the world, I shared this very peculiar moment with people I did not even know.

From the moment I said "Shalom," a bond was forged and from the warm look in the eyes of Baruch, one of the men I met who happens to share the Hebrew name of my father, I realized that no distance can divide people who share one heart.

Salameh masterminded terrorist incidents

Ali Hassan Salameh, known as the Red Prince, was one of Israel's most cunning enemies, at least until his luck ran out 24 years ago this month.

A Palestinian whose father was killed in 1948 fighting Jews in Palestine, Salameh was the mastermind of Black September, the organization that wreaked a trail of death and destruction in the 1970s.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Salameh planned several big terrorist operations, among them the 1972 Munich massacre of Israeli Olympic athletes, and a slew of smaller ones, notably the 1973 assassination of a Mossad agent in Spain.

To stretch an analogy, Salameh was the Yehiya Ayyash of his times, the skillful Hamas bomb builder who terrorized Israel from 1994 to 1996.

Like Ayyash and his successors, Salameh – the subject of a fast-paced book by Michael Bar-Zohar and Eitan Haber titled The Quest for the Red Prince (Fitzhenry & Whiteside) – lived by the sword and died by it.

More than that, Salameh was cut from the same cloth as his father, Hassan, an ardent Palestinian nationalist who was born in 1912 in a village close to what is now Ben-Gurion Airport.

Hassan Salameh, a vehement opponent of Jewish statehood, formed a 400-man force to battle the Zionists. In 1947 – the year the United Nations voted to partition Palestine into Jewish and Arab states – he prepared for the coming war by travelling to Beirut to buy arms and the services of several Germans who had been officers in the Wehrmacht.

"Palestine will become a bloodbath," he promised his followers at a rally in Jaffa. He was true to his word, claiming credit for killing 48 Jews and wounding 155.

But at the battle of Ras el Ein, near Jerusalem, he was hit by shrapnel. He died two days later, a hero and a martyr in Palestinian eyes.

His son, Ali Hassan Salameh, born in Beirut, was six years old when Hassan fell in battle. "I grew up in a family which considered struggle a matter of heritage which should be carried on by generation after generation," he recalled. "My upbringing was politicized. I lived the Palestinian cause."

Unlike most Palestinian refugees, Salameh was not raised in a squalid camp, but in a succession of fine homes.

At the age of 14, he was sent to a college in the West Bank, the first time he had set foot on Palestinian soil. Salameh continued his studies in Cairo, cultivating a taste for la dolce vita. He was partial to expensive clothes, enjoyed gourmet food and wine and chased women. In short, he was a playboy.

Urged on by his mother, he joined the PLO, taking a clerical job in its Kuwait office. But it was the Six Day War that galvanized him. He joined Fatah, the armed wing of the PLO, controlled by Yasser Arafat.

An admirer of Salameh's late father, Arafat welcomed him with open arms. Along with a few other Fatah recruits, Salameh was dispatched to Cairo for training in intelligence.

Arafat, the authors claim, needed Salameh for a new organization he intended to create within Fatah. It would be called Black September, in honour of Palestinian fighters who had been killed in the 1970 Jordanian civil war. Its purpose would be to engage in anti-Israeli terrorism. In the interests of plausible deniability, Black September would have no offices, address or spokesperson. Salameh would be its chief of operations.

Wasfi Tell, the prime minister of Jordan, was Black September's first victim. In November 1971, an assassin pumped five bullets into him as he strode through the lobby of Cairo's Sheraton Hotel. He died in a pool of blood, amid horrified onlookers.

Tell was targeted because he had overseen the offensive against the Palestinians in Amman. Shortly afterward, Black September claimed credit for an attack on the Jordanian ambassador in London.

On May 8, 1972, Black September hit the headlines again by hijacking Sabena flight 572 bound for Tel Aviv.

The hijackers were spearheaded by a seasoned pro, Kamal Rifat, who had successfully commandeered an El Al aircraft in July 1968 and flew it to Algeria. In return for the passengers and the plane, Israel released 15 terrorists.

In February 1972, Rifat hijacked a Lufthansa plane, diverting it to Yemen. Germany paid a $5-million (US) ransom for the passengers and the aircraft.

During the Sabena incident, Rifat demanded the release of 317 Palestinian terrorists imprisoned in Israeli jails.

By any measure, it was an audacious hijacking. Never before, or since, had a hijacked plane landed in Israel.

For Israel, it was a humiliating setback.

Having resolved to foil the plot, Israel sent commandos into the plane disguised as mechanics in white overalls.

Two of the soldiers assigned to overpower the terrorists were future prime ministers – Ehud Barak and Benjamin Netanyahu, a fact that is strangely missing in The Quest for the Red Prince, an otherwise comprehensive account of the plague of terrorism that defined the 1970s.

In any event, the Israeli counter-strike was successful. Two of the hijackers, including Rifat, were killed. None of the passengers was hurt. Under interrogation, the surviving terrorists disclosed that Salameh had sent them.

Next, Salameh formed an alliance with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and the Japanese Red Army.

Ali Hassan Salameh

On May 30, 1972, Salameh's terrorist squad attacked Ben-Gurion Airport. Twenty seven civilians, mainly Puerto Rican Catholic pilgrims but also a distinguished Hebrew University professor named Aharon Katzir, were ruthlessly gunned down. Two of the three Japanese attackers were killed. The survivor, Kozo Okamoto, spent 13 years in prison and was released in a 1985 prisoner exchange.

Four months after the airport attack, Black September struck yet again.

A team led by Muhammed Masalha – a Palestinian originally from Haifa who spoke perfect German – infiltrated the Olympic village in Munich and, in a hail of fire, murdered two Israeli athletes.

The terrorists, who were demanding the release of 200 of their compatriots in Israeli jails, grabbed Israeli hostages, and negotiations began.

The incident ended disastrously with the death of all the hostages and of a German policeman. Golda Meir, Israel's prime minister, ordered the Mossad to exact retribution.

Salameh's name was high up on the list.

Emboldened by the Munich carnage, Salameh launched a letter-bomb campaign aimed at Israeli diplomats and Jewish and Zionist leaders around the world. The first victim was Ami Shehori, the agricultural attache at Israel's embassy in London.

Salameh followed this up with the murder of Baruch Cohen, a Mossad agent, in Madrid.

Even though Salameh realized he was a hunted man, he did not moderate his high-living lifestyle. He frequented posh hotels and exclusive clubs and casinos. And though he was married, with two sons, he assiduously courted women.

In December 1972, Salameh's operatives seized Israel's embassy in Bangkok, Thailand. Salameh hoped he could win freedom for Okamoto and one of the women who had hijacked the Sabena plane.

The operation was a dismal failure, with the terrorists agreeing to end their siege and leave Thailand aboard a special Egyptian aircraft.

In the wake of this incident, Black September also shot and killed a clerk at an El Al office in Rome.

Salameh was almost killed in April 1973 when Israeli commandos struck a Palestinian building in Beirut. He was several buildings away, sleeping soundly.

A Mossad hit team went after Salameh several months later. The operation was a disaster. Instead of eliminating Salameh, they killed an innocent Moroccan waiter, Ahmed Boushiki, whom they mistook for Salameh.

The misbegotten mission, which took place in Lillehammer, Norway, led to the arrest and trial of the Mossad agents.

Having twice fallen short of the mark, Israel planned yet another attempt on his life.

In December 1978, a Mossad agent named Erika Chambers rented a room in Beirut facing an apartment occupied by Salameh and his wife, a former Miss Lebanon.

Some time later, Israeli Navy missile boats unloaded a cargo of explosives along Lebanon's coast. Chambers planted the explosives in a Volkswagen Golf, parking it near Salameh's flat.

On Jan. 22, Chambers pressed the switch of a remote-controlled device as Salameh's convoy drove by.

The Golf exploded, engulfing Salameh's Chevrolet in a huge fireball.

Salameh passed into history, but the Palestinian question continued to smoulder, as it does today, in the third year of a new century.

The Cost of Jewish Education

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
בתי חלמוד התורה המאוחדים בטורונטו

"Jewish education is one of most important gifts a parent can give a child," says Arthur Landa, Executive Director. We recognize the enormous financial burden a day school education places on families. Since our founding in 1907, we have maintained that "no child shall be denied a Jewish education because of inability to pay." Financial assistance is available to all qualifiying families of children in Grades One to Eight. To protect the privacy of families, information regarding subsidies is kept in strictest confidence. "Even the principals and teachers do not know which children receive aid," adds Landa.

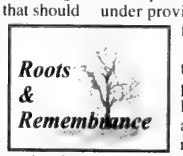
The Canadian Naturalization Project

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

To their immense credit, the Jewish genealogical societies of Ottawa and Montreal have completed the first stage of a computerized database that should make it much easier for many Canadians – Jewish and non-Jewish – to find naturalization records for their ancestors.



The Canadian Naturalization Project is an index of some 200,000 names of people who were naturalized as Canadian citizens between roughly 1916 and 1932. It is due to go online in about two months on the Web site of the Canadian Genealogy Centre, a new Web-based resource under the stewardship of the National Archives and Library of Canada.

Until now, the best way of finding an ancestral naturalization record was to write to the government, which would frequently fail to locate it, especially if the spelling of a surname had changed, or if the naturalization had occurred much later than the date of immigration.

Members of the Ottawa society had known for years that the names of people applying for Canadian citizenship were tabled each year in a parliamentary publication called Dominon of Canada (Parliamentary) Sessional Papers.

The listings show the names of applicants, occupation and residence, country of origin, dates of oath and certification, and certificate number. Once that latter fact is known, the full naturalization file is attainable from Citizenship and Immigration Canada, under provisions of the Access to Information act, for a $5 fee.

Two years, members of the Montreal society prodded their Ottawa colleagues to work together on a joint project to scan the roughly 4,000 pages, each showing about 50 names, and to find suitable optical character recognition software to read the images as text. Then team volunteers indexed the pages by the first and last names on each page, and sought out a home for the project.

Hymie Reichstein, president of the Ottawa society, likens the database to a series of small online phone books. The search engine will provide links to all of the pages in which a given name might appear. Eventually, project volunteers hope to index every name in the lists.

"This is really a gift to the people of Canada," Reichstein said.

Sylvie Tremblay, a spokesperson for the Canadian Genealogical Centre, said the naturalization database will be one of its strongest features. "Having these naturalizations online will be of great value to genealogists," she said. "I think it's going to be very popular."

Tremblay described the centre as "a single point of entry for Canadian genealogical resources," and said it will also offer a partial index of the 1901 census, how-to files on Canadian genealogy, and a directory of national resources, including inventories of related library and archival collections. Its Web site, already operational as a prototype, is www.genealogie.gc.ca.

An article about the project in the Fall 2002 issue of Avotaynu suggested that the lists include between 60,000 and 100,000 Jewish names, but Reichstein said that estimate was likely too high. However, he acknowledged they include "a high proportion of ethnics" because British subjects were already naturalized and so weren't compelled to apply.

The two societies have already located materials that will enable them to extend the database significantly beyond 1932. This second stage may take years to complete.

With a group of dedicated activists at its core, Ottawa's relatively tiny Jewish genealogical society is one of Canada's most accomplished. Last summer, it won an award from the International Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies for its work in photographing and indexing tombstones in an old Jewish cemetery in Chernivtsi, Ukraine.

It has also built up a collection of about 180 yizkor or remembrance books, probably the third largest such collection in Canada.

Israeli politics: holiness or holy mess?

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The State of Israel recently found itself in a sorry situation that thankfully happens only once every few years: an election campaign.

Granted, the political arena anywhere is never the place to find any dignity, much less integrity. Have we not come to expect uninspired and unenlightening campaigns? We are pretty much resigned to seeing honest debate on the issues being replaced by theatrics. Successful politics is, unfortunately, more about presentation than substance.

While this is all par for the course regarding politics in general, the politicians in the recent Israeli campaign managed to outdo themselves, even by Israeli standards, in finding new lows.

Labor, the state's founding and dominant party, found itself in such disarray that, as I write, predictions speak of it gaining as few as 20 of the Knesset's 120 seats.

But there was also much foreboding in the country's other major party, the ruling Likud, as Prime Minister Ariel Sharon fought accusations of financial impropriety.

And Shas, Israel's third largest and largely Sephardi party, became embroiled in an internal and divisive dispute and was also not expected not do well.

Thus, it appeared that all three of the largest parties were set to take a beating.

At any time, this would have been a sad state of affairs. How much more so at present, during Israel's state of sustained and constant crisis and the possibility of a U.S.-led war with Iraq.

If polls are to be believed, and perhaps they shouldn't be, the parties that stood to gain the most were the leftist Meretz and Shinui parties. Indeed, polls predicted Meretz would double its number of seats, to 22.

These parties have similar platforms, which some describe as "ultra secular" but which others describe as being downright anti religious.

Both parties' mottos openly advocate a "government without the religious." Their caustic political advertising in the media goes beyond anything seen in the West. In fact, if someone in the West would dare to attack religion or the religious in the ways seen during the recent Israeli campaign, we would immediately deem such behaviour to be unacceptable anti-Semitism and hateful, which of course it is. Wanton anti-Semitism is apparently kosher if it is generated by Jews themselves.

The left-leaning and secular Central Elections Committee (CEC) was vigilant in seeking out breaches of election regulations. Hence, it pulled the plug on Sharon's live televised address to the nation about allegations against him of financial impropriety, on the grounds the speech strayed from a defence of his actions into a partisan attack on other parties. Sharon later screamed to them indignantly, "Have you lost your minds?"

In Israel, as in all democratic nations, parties are allotted air time. But both Rabbi Ovadia Yosef of Shas and Rabbi Yitzhak Kadouri of Ahavat Yisrael were muzzled, because their promises in broadcast election speeches of divine blessing to voters who support their parties were also deemed illegal by the same left-wing election committee.

The wielding of such power by CEC members in order to advance their own political agenda is unprecedented in an open and free society.

In the end, one must have faith that truth and sanity will prevail.

Chicken Soup & the web, part 1: Health

The days are chilly, the nights are long and it's flu season. If ever there was a time to sit back and enjoy a steaming bowl of chicken soup, it's now. Over the next two weeks, I'll serve up some of the best chicken soup recipes on the Web. I'll also survey the Internet for some delicious chicken soup memories. But first, chicken soup and your health.

Aside from anecdotal evidence, does chicken soup really have curative powers? For the answer, we have to go to the centre for chicken soup research, the University of Nebraska Medical Center (UNMC). According to the site, "the Egyptian Jewish physician and philosopher, Moshe ben Maimonides, recommended chicken soup for respiratory tract symptoms in his 12th century writings which were, in turn, based on earlier Greek writings. But there's little in the literature to explain how it works."

Ten years ago, UNMC professor Dr. Stephen Rennard began investigating chicken for amusement. Then he realized that soup could have genuine value.

A UNMC press release explains, "Colds are the result of infection in the upper respiratory tract, which causes inflammation. Although colds are not completely understood, it is believed the inflammation contributes to cold symptoms. Dr. Rennard theorized if soup can stop or reduce inflammation, it might reduce the symptoms of a cold."

After administering some of his wife's grandmother's chicken soup along with various store-bought soups, Rennard found that all soups were equally effective in reducing inflammation. I highly recommend this site, which combines medical research with photos of the Rennard family and Grandma's chicken soup recipe [http://www.unmc.ed u/publicaffairs/chicken soup/].

CBC Television's Marketplace has also taken a look at chicken soup's possible medicinal value. The show interviewed Rennard and contagious disease specialist, Dr. Allison McGeer, who argues that there is no scientific evidence to prove chicken soup's healing powers. You can watch this entertaining report in both Quicktime and RealPlayer [http://cbc.ca /consumers/market/files/food/chicken soup/].

Two other chicken-soup believers are Abraham Ohry and Jenni Tsafrir. The Israeli researchers have asked the World Health Organization to declare chicken soup an "essential drug." For a drug to be proclaimed "essential," it must be "evidence-based, efficient, flexible and forward looking."

Ohry and Tsafrir say, "We feel certain that, despite the absence of significantly statistical evidence from scientific studies, chicken soup is here to stay as part of the armamentarium of traditional effective remedies. In answer to the question, whether it be a drug or not, chicken soup is... essential" [http://www.cmaj.ca/cgi /content/full/161/12/1532].

Whatever the scientists determine, I don't think anyone would disagree with Dr. Andrew Weil's suggestion that the true value of chicken soup goes beyond its ingredients. "The cultural implications of comfort, love and caring is captured in a mixture that fills your nose and warms your inside" [http://makeashorterlink. com/?A55E61623].

One person who uses chicken soup to try to make a difference in people's lives is Mollie Pier. Pier, who is in her early '80s, is a volunteer with Project Chicken Soup, an organization that provides homemade kosher meals to people with HIV/AIDS in Los Angeles. She decided to get involved with the project after she lost her youngest son, Nathaniel, to AIDS. "It gave me a spiritual feeling that my son's soul is still alive. I imagine he's looking down at me and saying, 'What you're doing is great'" [http://www.jewishjournal.com/old/seniors kahn.4.21.0 .htm]. You can find out more about Project Chicken Soup at their Web site [http://www.projectchickensoup.org/].

Of course, the curative properties of chicken soup aren't just a Jewish secret. The Chicken Soup for the Soul series, intended to give a moral boost to anyone in need, has spawned dozens of books, including, finally, Chicken Soup for the Jewish Soul [http://www.chickensoup. com/BookPromo/Jewish/Jewish.html].

But for all its amazing curative properties, there's one thing chicken soup can't do. As author Arthur Naiman says, "Chicken Soup: An ancient miracle drug containing equal parts of aureomycin, cocaine, interferon, and TLC. The only ailment chicken soup can't cure is neurotic dependence on one's mother" [http ://www.tealdragon.net/humor/quotes/ naiman_a.htm].

Next week, memories of bubbie and her beautiful bowl of soup.

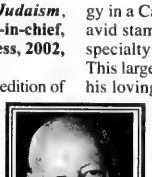
Rich collections of Judaic facts and artifacts



Books
Bernard Baskin

The New Encyclopedia Of Judaism*, Geoffrey Wigoder, editor-in-chief, New York University Press, 2002, $122.58.

This revised and expanded edition of a well-known, one-volume encyclopedia is an authoritative, attractive and valuable work of reference. It contains 1,200 updated entries, contributions from an international panel of renowned scholars, more than 300 illustrations (many in colour) and a wide-ranging annotated bibliography.

The initial article in this sturdy, 800-page volume deals with Aaron, brother of Moses; the final one is a biographical sketch of the 19th-century German scholar Leopold Zunz. Between "a" and "z" is a rich trove of information on Jewish history, theology, customs and ceremonies, Israel, biblical and talmudic personalities, art, music and much more. This impressive work would be a welcome addition to any congregational or home library.

The Jewish World in Stamps*, by Ronald Eisenberg, Schreiber Publishing, 2002, $57.50.

Dr. Ron Eisenberg, head of radiology in a California hospital, has been an avid stamp collector for 30 years. His specialty is stamps of Jewish interest. This large format volume – the work of his loving hands – displays more than 2,000 stamps, enlarged and in full colour, from all corners of the earth, that encompass 4,000 years of Jewish civilization.

It is astonishing how many Jewish personalities, living and dead, have been honoured by countries large and small. Countries such as Granada, Uganda, Venezuela and Bulgaria – to name just a few – have honoured such personalities as Dr. Jonas Salk, Marc Chagall, Raoul Wallenberg, Sigmund Freud, Anne Frank, Sandy Koufax – and hundreds of others.

A noteworthy feature of the book is the author's descriptions of the lives and times of these well-known personalities. One learns a great deal about Judaism through the ages. This is a must-have volume for philatelists young and old.

The Oxford History of Byzantium*, Cyril Mango, editor, Oxford University Press, 2003, $69.80.

In 324 CE, the Emperor Constantine chose an ancient Greek colony at the mouth of the Bosphorus River as his imperial residence. At the time, it was called Byzantion, then later Constantinople and today, Istanbul. It became, in time, the eastern capital of the Roman Empire and oversaw a vast territory.

Constantine's conversion to Christianity, the establishment of his new faith, the extension of his rule over the culturally Greek-dominated eastern half of the Roman world permitted the fusing of Christian religion, Roman imperial tradition, and Hellenic intellectual culture that was to characterize emergent Byzantine thought.

For more than 1,200 years, the empire grew in culture, power and influence, until it was overcome by Turkish warriors in the 15th century.

This beautifully illustrated history contains essays by leading scholars on all aspects of the empire's tumultuous history. It includes the rise of Islam, the struggles for Jerusalem and the protracted and bitter battle over icons and images in Christian worship. Crammed with historical fact and detail, these essays are not always easy to read, but they offer entry into an obscure, many-sided and turbulent world.

The CJN talks with CA leader Stephen Harper

The Canadian Jewish News: How does the Canadian Alliance's policy toward Israel and the Palestinian Authority differ from that of the Liberal party?

Stephen Harper: Let me just talk more about our policy and we'll get into the difference. I think like most Canadians, our policy is that we do want to see stability and ultimately peaceful solutions in the Middle East and in Israeli-Palestinian issues. That said, we view Israel as part of the western democratic family of nations. We're strongly supportive of Israel's right to exist and we see that a lot of the difficulty that the state of Israel has is simply that some elements of the Palestinian leadership and of its neighbours simply don't accept that. And I think under those circumstances, I think, particularly since Sept. 11, there's a better sense among Canadians of the difficulty that Israel has in that environment.

In terms of the differences with the Liberals, it goes through a range of issues. We're just a party that believes much more strongly in a kind of value-oriented foreign policy where we support western democracy and our western democratic allies. And we're much less tolerant of terrorism or of potential security threats. I can point to things ranging from our quick response to Sept. 11 – our unequivocal and immediate condemnation of those things through to our battle over the past year to make sure that Hezbollah is outlawed in Canada... I think what guides the Liberals in foreign policy increasingly is just the sense of moral neutrality in all these international disputes and conflicts.

CJN: Do you support the Israeli and U.S. assertion that a peace process cannot move forward while Yasser Arafat remains leader of the Palestinian Authority?

Harper: It's hard to see how that can happen. I think, to be fair, for there to be a peace process that is eventually successful, there does have to be recognized Palestinian leadership, and it can't be leadership imposed from outside and it can't be a fragmented leadership. But it must be leadership committed unequivocally to peaceful co-existence and to the right of Israel to exist, and it's not clear to us that we have that today in Mr. Arafat.

> 'We see Israel as an ally and part of our western democratic family'

CJN: Would you cut the $15 million that CIDA annually gives to the PA, and other funding such as the money given to the PA Coast Guard, until terrorism against Israel ends?

Harper: Our position has been that there should be no funding of any body – any branch of which is engaged in or morally supports terrorist activity or violence – and obviously we have that view of the Palestinian Authority, so we have called for the cutting off of that aid.

CJN: In a broader context, how would Canada's Middle East policies change under an Alliance government?

Harper: With so many of our foreign policies, what would change, not just in the Middle East but elsewhere, would be just a stronger sense of Canada as a member of an alliance, a member of a family of western democratic nations that share certain political values – and our determination to work with those countries to achieve those things. We have a view of Israel in the Middle East where we see Israel as an ally and part of our western democratic family.

So often with the Liberals in the Middle East and everywhere else, the Liberal position is simply morally neutralist in all of these conflicts. It simply doesn't seem to view a difference between right and wrong in these disputes – it simply views its role as being in some kind of middle all the time. And it's not to say that there isn't a role for Canada to promote peace – that's what all countries should do in third-party conflicts. But there are issues in this and in other conflicts – for instance, between the United States and Iraq – that are not simply matters of moral neutrality. There are issues of right and wrong involved.

CJN: Does the Canadian Alliance feel that war with Iraq is necessary and justified, and do you believe Canada should be involved if the United States chooses to act without UN support?

Harper: First and foremost, my answer to this is that we want to avoid war in Iraq and we want to see our government work with the Allied coalition and ultimately the goal of that being to see [Iraqi leader] Saddam Hussein disarmed and, preferably, through immense diplomatic and other pressure so that we avoid war but that we do achieve our objectives. That is what the allies are trying to do – they're trying to work with the United Nations to achieve those things and we support those efforts. Our first desire is to avoid any situation where we get into war or where the United Nations is unable to follow through on its own resolutions because that's what's at stake here... We want to see the United Nations' credibility maintained... I think, frankly, we all want to avoid that scenario [war with Iraq] and ultimately, if that came about, Canada would have to talk to its various allies, not just the United States, in terms of how it [would] respond in that situation.

'There is an alternative to the Liberals':Frum

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Journalist and writer Linda Frum is frustrated with the Liberal party and its stance toward Israel and wants to show the Jewish community there is an alternative.

Frum, the daughter of the late CBC journalist Barbara Frum, said she is angry that under the Liberal government, Canada has routinely voted against Israel's interests at the United Nations. She said she is also incensed at how long it took the party to add the Lebanese terrorist group Hezbollah to its list of terror groups banned in Canada.

Linda Frum

"People believe they don't have any alternative to the Liberals," she said in a recent interview. "The message that I've been trying to get across is that we absolutely do have an alternative to the Liberals, with a very credible party that has proven itself to be a very reliable friend of Israel."

Frum, who has visited Israel several times, said, "I know the Alliance party is supportive of Israel, so I want to help them get their message out. I've never felt this desperate to see [the Liberal party] gone."

She has hosted events to bring together leaders of the Canadian Alliance and the Jewish community, including a recent reception at her Toronto home attended by about 100 members of the community, which featured Stephen Harper as keynote speaker (see The CJN's interview with Harper on page 1).

The Jan. 15 reception was the second such event that Frum has hosted. The first event, which Frum and her husband Howard Sokolowski co-hosted with friends Rachelle and David Bronfman, took place in late November and featured former Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day as guest speaker.

Frum credits Sokolowski and his involvement with UJA Federation (he was co-chair of last year's UJA campaign) for spurring her to take action. She accompanied him on several lectures and meetings during his tenure as UJA co-chair.

"This re-ignited some dormant feelings I had about a passion for Israel... because of Howard, my awareness was increased," Frum said.

"I think the catalyst for me was attending a lot of UJA events and speaking with members of the Jewish community who would express their rage but felt [the Liberal party] was the only choice they had, to which I would say, 'Why do you feel the Liberal party is the only choice for you?'" she said. "I finally said I have to do something."

Frum's passion for Israel is a key factor behind her desire to see political change in Canada.

"I think collectively, as a community, we have a tremendous sense of despair and sadness about the situation in Israel, and it's magnified by the fact that our government is openly hostile to Israel," she said.

Associated graduate appointed new educational director

Associated Hebrew Schools has announced the appointment of Mark Smiley as director of education as of July 1, 2003.

He will replace Rabbi Abraham Soffer, who has held the position for 17 years.

Smiley, a graduate of Associated, is currently headmaster of Hillel Day School of Metropolitan Detroit and a faculty member at the Day School Leadership Training Institute of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York, where he is currently finishing rabbinical school.

Sheldon Goodman, Associated's chairman of the board and head of the search committee, said in a statement that Smiley is an "experienced educator, and an accomplished leader [who] has a passion for Jewish education. We are looking forward to helping him lead our school to further excellence.

"He returns to the school after becoming one of the most prominent and well-respected Jewish educators in North America," Goodman said.

Smiley called his appointment "an unbelievable opportunity to be able to direct one of the world's most prestigious day schools.

"The commitment of Associated to educational excellence, Zionist education, a love of classical texts and the State of Israel has impacted Jewish day schools throughout North America."

Smiley said he is honoured to be able "to give back to the school what I received here as a student. I look forward to helping Associated be a school that empowers children to grow, inspired by the wisdom of both our Torah tradition and western civilization."

Sheldon Carr, president of Associated, said Smiley encompasses all of the school's ideals.

"He is one of North America's leading educators, and fully embraces our dedication to providing our children with the best Jewish and general studies education available. His appointment is both a homecoming and a new beginning."

The Gerofsky family cousins club today (above) and then.

Gerofsky family keeps on meeting for 50 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After 50 years, the Gerofsky family keeps on meeting.

In 1953, first cousins Violet Brown and Mildred State, grandchildren of Benjamin and Rachel Gerofsky who immigrated to Stratford, Ont., from Latvia in 1905, decided to start a cousins club.

After the family's recent anniversary celebrations, which included a hotel dinner that attracted 40 people – the oldest was 96 – and a theatre outing in Stratford, Brown, 85, said she's not at all surprised that they've kept up the tradition after all these years.

"We were committed to keeping the family together. We didn't want to be cousins who only see each other at weddings and funerals. We wanted our children to really know each other," said Brown.

She remembers, as a child, travelling regularly from her home in Guelph to visit family in neighbouring towns.

"Families were not as busy then; children didn't take part in so many activities. We got together in people's homes, and that was our activity. It was a different world."

Brown's nephew, Howard Brown, who has been president of the cousins club for five years, said one of the cousins died shortly after last year's dinner.

"Imagine, before she died, she was able to see 60 of her cousins in one place. She died knowing the meaning of a strong family bond."

He said that apart from the annual dinner when they take a formal photograph, they've arranged spin-off activities. They plan annual theatre trips to Stratford, and families with young children have held a children's Chanukah party.

They've even developed a family coat of arms complete with a herring, rye bread and sour cream.

The phrase on the coat of arms – non customerum exit – is in honour of one of the cousins who ran a retail store, said Violet. "No customer was allowed to leave her store without buying something. Translated, the phrase means no customer gets out."

Keeping up the club has taken hard work, said Howard, but people are interested. "Obviously, we can't involve every person at every event, but as long as the group comes together, the club will keep going.

"In most families, people do their own thing with their immediate relatives, and grow apart from their cousins. We believe in celebrating our family life."

Violet Brown said she doesn't know of many families in which everyone talks to each other. "We're all still talking," she said.

READATHON FOR TERROR VICTIMS:
A Readathon sponsored by Shmuel Zahavy Cheder Chabad raised close to $1,000 in pledges to aid seven Israeli children orphaned by a Palestinian terrorist attack. Twenty-three students from grades 2 to 7 read a total of almost 20,000 minutes in the fund-raising effort. The youngsters received small prizes and certificates recognizing their achievement.

CORRECTION

In the story "Evangelical Christian spawns support for Israel" (Jan. 2), we reported that the Canadian branch of the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem (ICEJ) co-sponsored a speaking engagement in Toronto by U.S. journalist Joseph Farah. In fact, the ICEJ helped publicize the event among its supporters, but it did not co-sponsor the event.

Israeli embassy criticizes NDP Mideast mission

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
CJN Staff

TORONTO — A senior official in the Israeli Embassy rebuked the NDP last week, saying a member of the party's recent peace mission to the Middle East compared Israel's treatment of the Palestinians to the treatment of the Jews by the Nazis in World War II.

Ronen Gil-Or, the embassy's deputy head of mission in Ottawa, told the Toronto Star that three days of programming had been arranged to help the five-member group understand the Israeli side of the situation, but participants took only one day to meet with an Israeli labour group and a representative from the Israel Defence Forces (IDF).

Gil-Or told the Star that at the meeting with the IDF representative, academic and businessman David Berlin made reference to Adolf Eichmann, the Nazi official in charge of implementing Adolf Hitler's "Final Solution" to annihilate European Jewry.

"According to my people who were there, [Berlin] did a comparison about what is going on in the territories and Palestinian cities and what the Nazis did against the Jews," Gil-Or said.

He said Berlin was asked to clarify or retract his statement but he refused.

Berlin, who ran as an NDP candidate in Toronto Centre-Rosedale in the 2000 federal election, told The CJN in an interview that Gil-Or's comments were based on "hearsay" and called the Star "absolutely irresponsible" for not getting a comment from him before running a story that "made me sound like [NDP MP] Svend Robinson."

Berlin said the IDF representative, Maj. Daniel Beaudoin, deputy head of the IDF's foreign relations branch, was angered because Berlin told him the Israeli soldiers the delegation encountered were not adequately trained to serve in hostile areas, such as checkpoints and near construction zones for the new security fence, and that the army is "not doing occupation well."

In a letter of complaint to the Star, Berlin, who was born in Israel and served in the IDF in the Yom Kippur War under the current prime minister, Ariel Sharon, denied that during the delegation's conversations with Beaudoin he compared "the goings-on in the occupied territories and what the Nazis did to the Jews."

It was in the context of Beaudoin 's attempts to defend the army's actions that "I conjured up Eichmann and [Zionist leader Chaim] Weizmann – but not in a way of accusing the IDF, but by way of accusing Maj. Beaudoin of trying to snow us in the way that Eichmann had tried to snow Weizmann," Berlin said in the letter, referring, he told The CJN, to negotiations in the early 1940s between Eichmann and Weizmann to secure the release of Jews from Nazi-occupied areas, in which Eichmann made no mention of Nazi plans to exterminate them.

Berlin said he made the comments to Beaudoin in Hebrew and acknowledges that he lost his temper. "I was talking as an Israeli to an Israeli," Berlin said.

Gil-Or told the Star that the NDP mission spent most of its time with Palestinians or in the West Bank and Gaza and that it "was not an objective peace-seeking delegation. From what they're saying and their conclusions from the visit, we don't believe they did the right job."

The 16-day NDP trip to Israel, Jordan, the West Bank and Gaza was headed by outgoing federal leader Alexa McDonough and also included Alberta-based peace activist Carolyn Pogue, former MP David MacDonald and Rev. Bill Phipps, head of the group Religions for Peace.

At the end of the tour earlier this month, McDonough, who is also her party's critic on the Middle East, commented from Jerusalem that "people are desperate to see Canada take more responsibility to pressure our American neighbours to stop bankrolling the military heavy-handedness here."

She also said that "Canada needs to be far more vocal in efforts to try to persuade the Israeli government that in the name of fighting terrorism and seeking security, you can't trample human rights, human lives and human dignity. You contribute not to security, but to an escalation of violence that fuels terrorism."

McDonough told the Star last week that her group had an "extremely wide-ranging series of meetings and experiences, tours and full co-operation on all sides" and that it was not their intention to spend all their time with the government of either side.

She said she intends "to seek a meeting with the Israeli Embassy and with the Palestinian representative [in Canada] to talk about our trip."

Parents checking out Israel trip want own program

By ESTHER SALVE-HINDEL
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

In September, my 17-year-old daughter Rachel told us she wished to spend next year in Israel on a United Synagogue Youth (USY) program.

The program, called Nativ, allows students to spend a year in Israel, one term studying at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and one term working on a kibbutz.

This trip is an exciting prospect for her. When she is asked if she is afraid to travel and live in Israel, she responds with a strong, "No!"

In December, I travelled to Israel as part of a group of 10 USY parents – nine Americans and myself, the lone Canadian. Each of us was considering sending a child on a USY Israel trip, either for the summer or for a year-long program.

When I was asked to go on the trip, I jumped at the opportunity. My friends and family were fearful, but I feel like we're letting Israel down as Jews by not going there. I also wanted to know more about the Nativ program.

We learned about USY's plans to offer our children an enriching experience that would also be safe. Our visit was a mini-version of what our children's trips would be. We visited some tourist sites, met representatives from USY Israel, the Fuchsberg Center for Conservative Judaism, the Jewish Agency and young people currently participating in Nativ.

Security issues were addressed directly. All itineraries had to be approved by the Jewish Agency's security department. Each bus tour has two armed security personnel, one of whom is also a medic. Changes to itineraries can be made even at the last minute. Our trip to an archaeological dig at Beit Guvrin was cancelled because of heavy rains. An alternate outing was immediately arranged and approved.

The young people on summer programs are always supervised. Students with Nativ are allowed to go only to shopping malls, restaurants and clubs that have security.

We asked the students if they felt restricted in any way. They had no doubt that the security arrangements were for their own welfare and found they in no way hampered their experience in Israel. In fact, their enthusiasm for a first-hand experience of their Jewish heritage was profound. At the end of our four-day trip, not only had we each decided to send our children to Israel, we wanted USY to organize a parents' summer program! I am convinced that Jewish youth need to experience Israel in order to stay involved in Jewish life here in North America.

Being in Israel reminded me that it is the Jewish state and contains our history. Being where the Declaration of Independence was promulgated really resonated right through me. I felt my own Jewishness in a way I don't feel it here.

I think it's important for children not to be afraid. They're learning from us. They need this for their future. I had no idea about the magnitude of what these kids experience, what they're shown, who they talk to.

The Israelis I met felt as if they were alone in fighting for Israel's survival. I came back resolved to support the country in every way I can. This was the feeling that my older daughter, Elisheva, brought back from her short time there as a Birthright Israel participant last summer.

For Rachel, who is president of her USY chapter at Beit Rayim Synagogue in Richmond Hill, this will be an opportunity to connect her past, her religious observance and her USY experience here to her future as a Jewish woman.

Esther Salve-Hindel lives in Richmond Hill, Ont.

MOSAIC: Mosaic, a gathering of communities for interfaith dialogue, recently held its 23rd annual peace meal, marking the anniversary of the birth of Martin Luther King Jr. The program, held at St. Luke's Parish, included a panel of religious leaders from Judaism, Buddhism, Christianity, Hinduism, Islam, Sikhism and Zoroastrianism and a selection of youth choirs. JCS changes name to Hillel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

It's official – Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS) is now called Hillel of Greater Toronto, reflecting its status for the past four years as an official affiliate of the international umbrella organization Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

The name change was approved last week at JCS' annual general meeting, held at the Barbara Frum Library.

Over the past year, said JCS chair Larry Sonenberg, the organization has focused on Israel advocacy, for which it received an extra $75,000 from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Among its Israel-related activities were a three-day conference in Niagara Falls for more than 120 students, a presentation by Harvard Law School professor Alan Dershowitz, a winter leadership conference in Israel for two dozen students, and the current three-campus israelFest 2003 running from Jan. 20 to Jan. 30.

But Sonenberg said the organization also hosts a variety of other activities, including a volunteer mission to El Salvador and Kiev, an intergenerational "senior prom" at Lincoln Place Nursing Home, and a joint program with Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish and Humanitarian Relief Committee to make sandwiches for the homeless.

The new facility for Jewish students at the University of Toronto, called the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Life, is expected to open in the fall, Sonenberg said.

Last fall's Israel advocacy conference was a "jumping-off point" for many students to get involved, said Zac Kaye, director of the newly named Hillel. "The reality is that many of our students are really not familiar with the [Israel-Arab conflict]."

Many don't know how to answer when they are challenged on the issues, he said, adding that education has been the underlying principle of JCS' Israel advocacy initiatives.

Although Kaye acknowledged that "clearly there are issues [with respect to anti-Israel activity]" on Toronto campuses, none of them approaches "anywhere near a Concordia situation." He was referring to the violent protests that took place at the university when Israeli Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu visited there in September and the more recent suspension of Concordia Hillel's funding and on-campus activities for distributing flyers about Mahal, a program that allows Jews from abroad to serve in the Israel Defence Forces for 18 months.

Jewish students in Toronto – estimated at 15,000 – express tremendous pride in Israel and have a great desire to speak out on its behalf, said Kaye.

He said Hillel is working on reaching Jewish students at local colleges such as George Brown and Centennial and on developing links with other campuses in southwestern Ontario, such as the University of Western Ontario, McMaster University and the University of Waterloo, which have a large percentage of Jewish students originally from Toronto.

Hillel is also attempting to reach high school students, he said, and a campus fair to familiarize the double cohort with Jewish life on campus is planned for Feb. 13.

Queen's AMS approves statement

KINGSTON, Ont. — The student government at Queen's University, known as the Alma Mater Society, voted 26 to 3 last week in favour of a reworked statement addressed to the Concordia Student Union (CSU), originally proposed by the executive of Queen's Hillel. The letter, titled A Statement in Defence of the Equal Rights of all Student Groups Across Canada, expressed the commitment of Queen's students to freedom of speech, religion and association and called for a "prompt and equitable resolution to the current dispute" between the CSU and Concordia Hillel. In early December, the CSU suspended Hillel's funding and right to use space on campus for distributing flyers about Mahal, a program that allows young Jews from abroad to serve in the Israeli army. The CSU has since reinstated Hillel's right to use campus facilities, but its funding remains frozen.

Pipes to speak at York despite earlier veto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A lecture by Philadelphia-based pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes, scheduled as part of York University's IsraelFest this week, was given the green light Friday by York president Lorna Marsden, reversing last week's veto of the event by the management of York's Student Centre.

The centre had blocked the event because of security concerns. The venue for the Tuesday afternoon program was changed from the Underground, a restaurant in the centre, to York's Tait McKenzie athletic facility, to address security concerns, said Zac Kaye, director of Hillel of Greater Toronto (formerly Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto), the umbrella for Jewish students at all Toronto-area campuses.

The lecture, titled Barriers to Peace in the Middle East, would not have happened without the assistance of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Kaye said.

CJC executive director Bernie Farber, who spoke to Marsden directly, said, "She was concerned for the security of the students and the university itself, but, I believe, was very committed to ensuring that the talk went on and was looking for a way to bring that about."

Concordia U. opens hearings

Closed hearings began last week at Concordia University for nine students facing disciplinary action under the university's Code of Rights and Responsibilities in connection with their alleged roles in the violent Sept. 9 protest that led to the cancellation of a speech on campus by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Their cases are being heard by a panel of three students chosen by university secretary Danielle Tessier from a pool of 18 nominated by the Concordia Student Union (CSU) and the Graduate Student Association.

The identities of the accused students and the location of the hearings are being kept confidential by Concordia.

Those charged are not permitted formal legal representation, but they have access to advocates from within the university and can call witnesses in their defence.

Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) peacefully protested the hearings on their opening day, claiming the charges "criminalize" student activism. It was forced to hold its demonstration outside the university after the administration obtained a court order preventing it from being held on campus.

In a press release, the university said it "deplores any attempt to intimidate or disrupt the hearings... and any calls for action that may be interpreted as encouraging further intimidation or disruption on campus."

About 50 Hillel members held a simultaneous rally, a block away from the SPHR demonstration, but there were no incidents.

Most of the charges against the nine students relate to allegations they broke through a security perimeter in the Hall Building and occupied the mezzanine and escalators before Netanyahu's scheduled appearance. Concordia says such actions are a violation of the code's article 16, which prohibits creating an "intimidating and hostile atmosphere."

One student is charged in connection with the verbal and physical harassment of persons attempting to enter the Hall Building for the Netanyahu event.

Concordia said more suspects could not be identified because these incidents were not videotaped.

The nine students, if found guilty, face sanctions ranging from written reprimand to suspension or expulsion.

ממשלה חילונית בישראל?

הבחירות בישראל הוכרעו עוד בטרם התחילו. ממש לא משנה כמה יחושד שרון במעשים אלה או אחרים- יש לו תמיכה מאסיבית. חבשורה האמיתית של הבחירות הנוכחיות היא שבין הצעירים והעולים החדשים יש לשמאל פחות מעשרה אחוזים. אי לכך אין שום עתיד למפלגת העבודה, ולכן צריך להתחיל לחשוב במותגים חדשים. היה איזה רגע סהרורי בתחילת ינואר שהיה נדמה שסוף סוף הציבור הישראלי מתחיל להבין את גודל השחיתות בליכוד, והעבודה הצליחה לשבור כלפי מעלה. אבל לא עברו יומיים והסקר הזה התבדה, ומפלגת העבודה חזרה להיות מפלגת האבודה.
האם תותר לראשונה ממשלה חילונית בישראל? לדברי שמעון פרס אין סיכוי כזה, כי חליכוד יעדיף את החרדים על שינוי.

שם שכדאי לזכור

לאלה מיכם שחובבים מוסיקה קלאסית כדאי לזכור את השם קרי ניקול לָמְיֶה, זמרת קונטרה אלט צעירה מעיירה קטנה בקונטיקט, שזכתה בשנים האחרונות בפרסים היקרים ביותר. ראיתי אותה ב"קאֶרְנֶגִי מיוזיק" שרה באֶך וויואלדי. קול מדהים, חם ומרגש. בשיר מקפיא עצמות היא הרימה את גג כנסיית טריניטי והעבירה בנו צמרמורת נעימה.

התאבדותה של y net

רבים מאיתנו מחוברים בימים טרופים אלה לאינטרנט, לקרוא חדשות רצופות מישראל. וכך אני מוצא את עצמי קורא קבוע את "הארץ", "מעריב" ו"וַי נֶט" של " ידיעות אחרונות", שלפי השמועה היו לחם כמילין מבקרים עד לפני חודש....מדוע? משום שאז החליטו לגבות כסף עבור חשירות הזה (זכותם), ולפי דעתי איבדו את הרוב המוחלט של הגולשים. החלטה תמוהה, אבל שישאר בינינו.

נֶייט האפמן

לקרוא עיתון ישראלי היא חוויה די קשה, כי יש הרבה דברים שלילים וכמעט אף לא בשורה אחת חיובית. אז חינה סוף סוף שני דברים חיובים.
באֶרץ שיש בה כל כך חרבה אסטרונאוטים, מחלקי קמיעות, מאמינים בבאבות ובקברים קדושים, סוף סוף יש אסטרונאוט אמיתי, שטס לחלל מכף קָאנָאוֶרָל ולא ממים קדושים ומקברי צדיקים. לקח לאילן רמון חמש שנים של אימונים, וחזה כבר מפקד טיייסת ואלוף משנה. מה המשמעות האמיתית של החישגי קשה לדעת. היא לבטח מראה את הקשר האסטראגי בין ישראל וארה"ב, ואולי גם תעזור לחזכיר לָעולם עניין ואנטישמי שישראל היא ארץ עם אֶיכות גבוחה של אנשים, ושכל ניסיון להחרים אותה מלמד יותר על אופי המחרימים מאשר על אופי המוחֲרָמים. אבל שישאר בינינו.

המפלָט

וחדבר החוב חשני:
עם עליית מפלס השחיתות, ומפלס חשטאה וחדמגוגיה, ומפלס חנועל נפש- עלה גם מפלס הכניסת בחמישה מטרים!!!

The Hours

Post and Globe agree on 'right of return'

It is always noteworthy when the Globe and Mail and the National Post agree on a subject, especially one as contentious as Israeli-Palestinian relations. In its editorial, "An NDP blind spot" (Jan. 18), the Globe chastised NDP leadership candidates for blaming Israel for the violence of the past 28 months, and for virtually ignoring Palestinian suicide bombings, anti-Israel incitement and rejection of Israel's very legitimacy as a Jewish state. The editorial even faulted the candidates for naively assuming that a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the territories would eliminate these core hatreds.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Globe went on to single out one of the candidates, Joe Comartin, for "insisting" that Israel accept UN General Assembly Resolution 194. For decades, the Palestinians, Arab states and their supporters have falsely asserted that this resolution gives the Palestinians a "right of return" to present-day Israel. The Globe correctly, and importantly, noted that the right of return "is viewed almost universally within Israel as a recipe for the demographic destruction of the Jewish state, and is supported for just that reason by many who seek Israel's demise."

But the paper stated, somewhat inaccurately, that the intent of Resolution 194 is "to allow a mass return of refugees." The resolution speaks only of refugees who are prepared to live in peace with Israel (or to accept compensation) being "permitted" to return – a permission that Israel would either extend or refuse according to its sovereign right. When the resolution was adopted in December 1948, this point was moot: the Arabs voted uniformly against it precisely because they were waging a war to eliminate Israel and were thus not prepared to "live in peace" – a tragic state of affairs that continues for too many of them today (formal peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan notwithstanding).

On almost all of these points, the National Post concurs. Its detailed, comprehensive editorial "The Middle East's other refugees" (Jan. 20), notes that, "To this day, a majority of Arabs cling to the comforting delusion that Israel might somehow be destroyed through force of arms, terrorism or demographic pressures" – the principal one of which is the flooding of Israel with refugees.

This human tragedy has been created because Arab states have insisted, with UN assistance and encouragement, on keeping the original 600,000 to 750,000 refugees and many of their descendants – a total of approximately 3.5 million refugees – in the region, living in squalid camps that breed anti-Israel hatred and irredentism. The argument made by Palestinian intellectual Sari Nusseibeh that the Palestinians should relinquish their claim of a "right of return" to Israel in exchange for a genuine two-state solution (in which they would "return" to their own country) is rare, offering faint hope for a more realistic Palestinian/Arab reassessment.

Finally, the Post reminds its readers about the rarely mentioned plight of Jews from Arab and Muslim lands. Numbering approximately 800,000, these Jews were expelled from lands in North Africa and the Gulf region in 1948, when Israel was established, and in the following years.

Artist remembered for her creativity and caring

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Hamilton Correspondent

ST. CATHARINES, Ont. — Helen Eleanor (Chip) Feldman, a local artist whose creativity shone through her skill in the kitchen as well as in her works of art, died last month at age 76.

Obituary

Feldman's paintings were featured in more than 20 one-woman shows, yet much of her recognition locally came from her cooking, baking and pickling. Her cookies were in great demand among her friends. Her pickles were so popular that she and her husband Jack decided to sell them. Last fall they sold 120 jars.

Jack and Chip did the pickling together, using an old Romanian recipe. An upscale Toronto grocery store was interested in selling the pickles, but they wanted 100 jars a week – too much for the Feldmans to handle.

Chip Feldman was passionate about her art. Each room in the Feldman home is resplendent with her paintings, and two of her bronze sculptures adorn the base of the living room fireplace.

Her paintings were sold at the annual Hadassah auctions, where one was sold for about $800 one year.

The daughter of the late Moishe and Goldie Grafstein and sister of the late Sonny Grafstein, Feldman grew up in Toronto. As a young child with a talent for playing the drums, she joined her sisters in a family orchestra that played at bar mitzvah parties and other events.

She became interested in art in high school, studied at the Ontario College of Art in Toronto, and more recently, took classes at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Jack and Chip Feldman celebrated their 54th wedding anniversary shortly before her death. Their relationship began with a blind date arranged by friends in August 1948. They were married in December of that year.

Feldman enjoyed entertaining guests in her home. She loved meeting new people, and for the past two summers, the couple turned their home into a bed and breakfast.

She loved yard sales, antique shops and auctions and was delighted to discover a bargain.

"Chip hoped to find a treasure for the Antiques Roadshow," her husband said.

Rabbi Bernard Baskin, rabbi emeritus of Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom, officiated at the funeral. In his eulogy, he described Feldman's art as "original, clever and proficient."

He said he and his wife cherish several drawings she gave them after a trip to Israel they shared 27 years ago.

"Jewish values and ideals were always prominent in her mind when she engaged in community activities. She worked on behalf of Hadassah, was a creative and perennial organizer of the synagogue bazaar, lent both time and effort to such diverse groups as the women's shelter program and to local hospitals," he said.

Chip Feldman

Rabbi Baskin said the touchstone of her personality was her irrepressible zest for life. She was warm and caring, and at the same time, she was determined and strong in her views.

In his eulogy, Feldman's nephew, Robert Kaplan, former solicitor general of Canada, said: "She was so creative: a talented artist who loved to paint and share her work; a fabulous mischief-maker, and mischief is an under appreciated talent; a piano and drum-playing musician; a storyteller; a prolific mass-production cook whose elegant and original productions in themselves would have been enough to make her famous."

Feldman had a unique ability to make the person she was with feel happy, Kaplan said.

"You knew that if she was coming or if she would be there, it was enough. It would be a good moment and you could get ready to feel wonderful."

Speaking on behalf of the Feldman siblings, daughter Barbara Feldman said: "Mom cooked, baked and canned delicious things. Our freezers are all packed with her soups, latkes, blintzes, pesto and especially cookies."

Chip was famous for giving away care packages of food, she said.

"Mom... was always accompanied by her bags and bags of labelled containers. My mom's heart overflowed with love, generosity, kindness and thoughtfulness. Mom also had great energy, keen powers of observation and a quick wit."

Referring to her mother's art, she said, "Mom's pictures are filled with light and colour, joy and vitality—just like her."

Census figure for Montreal's Jews questioned

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Community leaders are not ready to concede that Montreal's Jewish population has dropped from about 100,000 people a decade ago to just over 80,000 people today, as suggested by figures on ethnicity released last week from the 2001 Canadian census.

Both FEDERATION CJA and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) say they will wait until May, when census data on religious identity comes out, to draw conclusions about the size of the community.

Nevertheless, they concede the data on ethnicity indicate the community may no longer have 100,000 members, the figure generally cited by the two organizations.

According to Statistics Canada, 82,450 people in Quebec cited Jewish as at least one of the ethnic or cultural groups with which they identify. Of those, 80,390 lived in the Montreal area.

The census, completed in May 2001, allowed respondents to fill in up to four ethnic or cultural origins.

A total of 52,545 Quebec respondents listed Jewish as their sole origin, while another 29,905 included Jewish among multiple responses.

In the last full census in 1991, slightly more than 98,000 people in Quebec identified themselves as Jewish by ethnic origin. The figure from the mini-census of 1996 was more than 92,000.

Across Canada, the census found 348,605 respondents who claimed to have Jewish ethnic origins – a drop of about one per cent over the 1996 mini-census and more than five per cent compared to the 1991 census.

According to 2001 statistics, the Jewish community is the 10th largest ethnic group in Quebec (when Canadian, Québécois and North American Indian are included), slightly less numerous than people of German ancestry and just ahead of those with origins in Haiti.

FEDERATION CJA executive vice-president Danyael Cantor said his organization has been doing its utmost to retain Jews and to attract immigrants, including spending tens of millions of dollars on the Jewish Community Campus and on outreach to Argentine Jews.

Community waiting for May statistics

"This is a very dramatic statement of our confidence in our future in Quebec," he said.

Cantor said that because an ethnic definition of Jewish identity is "ambiguous" and the wording of the census question on ethnic origin has changed over the years, the federation feels it is "too early to understand the impact... Until the religion data is in, we have an incomplete picture."

He said FEDERATION CJA uses a combination of ethnic and religious statistics to determine the size of the community.

CJC Quebec Region president Joseph Gabay echoed Cantor's interpretation of the latest statistics. "I am being very cautious now. We have more confidence in the religious figures," he said.

"But is is true we have a large proportion of old people here, so one can assume there have been more deaths than births. But I'm optimistic about the future and we will just have to reinforce what we are doing, including encouraging more immigration."

The question on the 2001 census was: "To which ethnic or cultural group(s) did this person's ancestors belong?" A list of examples was provided that included "Jewish."

Jack Jedwab, executive director of the independent Association for Canadian Studies and a lecturer in demographics at McGill University, believes the community may pick up 3,000 to 5,000 more people in the religious statistics, but not more.

Jedwab believes Jews have continued to leave the province in recent years. He said the census data on language released in December found that 30,000 Quebecers whose mother tongue is English moved to other provinces between 1996 and 2001.

"I think it's reasonable to assume that 20 to 25 per cent of them were Jewish," he said.

Precision cannot be assured in determining Jewish identity by ethnicity alone because some Jews may consider their ethnicity to be, for instance, Russian or Polish, Jedwab said. However, he does not think a significant number of Quebec Jews did not include Jewish as at least one of their origins.

Nor does he think Jews are likely to be among the growing number who identify their ethnic origin as Canadian only.

A more significant question is just how meaningfully Jewish are those who gave multiple responses, Jedwab said. It's conceivable some might be aware of a single Jewish ancestor, but are themselves practising another faith.

McGill sociology professor Morton Weinfeld, who has studied the Canadian Jewish community for many years, said the 80,000 figure may fairly reflect "the steady decline of the community for the past 30 years.

"The community is very aged and there has probably been a high mortality rate, which was not offset by births. There is an 'echo effect' today from those young people who left many years ago and had their children elsewhere," he said.

"The latest figures point to the need for the community to be more pro-active in its immigration policy."

Fellow McGill academic Jim Torczyner, who has been studying census data since 1971, thinks no accurate figure on Jewish population can be arrived at until the religion figures are factored in. He is confident that the number of Jews in Quebec by religion will be higher, as it has been historically.

Torczyner, who heads a centre at McGill that publishes studies on Canada's ethnic communities, said the ethnic data "is not reliable at all [for accurately determining Jewish population]. These statistics ought not to alarm... we will only know the truth in May."

EDAH
The courage to be modern and Orthodox

Has Canada's Jewish population dropped?

Brym said that the community, despite these figures, is "stable."

He said the full story will be known in May, when Statistics Canada releases data on religion. The 1996 mini-census did not ask the religion question.

The 2001 census showed that "Jewish" was the 17th most popular choice overall of ethnic origin, sandwiched between Welsh and Russian. Respondents were allowed to choose up to four ethnic origins, including "Canadian."

A total of 186,475 Canadians listed Jewish as their sole ethnic origin (down five per cent from 1996), while 162,130 included Jewish among multiple responses (up five per cent over 1996).

Canadian was, in fact, the most common ethnic category across the country, followed by English, French and Scottish. Rounding out the top ten ethnicities were Irish, German, Italian, Chinese, Ukrainian and North American Indian.

Statistics Canada and Jewish officials have long regarded Judaism as both a religion and an ethnic or cultural marker. (No other faith or ethnicity falls into both categories.)

Community planners use the numbers to gauge many social trends, such as intermarriage, immigration, education, mobility and family status, and to help earmark communal spending. UIA Federations Canada (UIAFC) and federations across the country, are closely studying the 2001 census numbers for the National Jewish Demographic Study.

The 1991 census found that 318,070 Canadians said their religion was Jewish. But community planners haven't relied solely on that number, or on ethnicity figures. They've used a blend of both, excluding only those who cited Jewish ethnic origins but who professed another religion.

The final tally – the official one – was 356,315 Jews in Canada as of 1991.

McGill University social work professor James Torczyner, who has analyzed census data for three decades, says the latest figures on ethnic background are skewed and unreliable.

"The community should not react in any way to these numbers. They're worth talking about only to caution the community not to believe it is declining when every other indicator says it is increasing."

The only way to get a true count is by combining the figures on ethnicity and religion, Torczyner said.

In fact, Torczyner is optimistic that the religion numbers will reflect an increase in the number of Jews in Canada "by at least 10 per cent [over 1991], primarily due to immigration and perhaps increased birthrates."

One reason the ethnic numbers are distorted, he explained, is that Jews "do not tend to identify with ethnicity, especially the elderly and immigrants. Some might say they have Polish or Russian origins, but when it comes to being Jewish, they list it as a religion."

Charles Shahar, the researcher in charge of the National Jewish Demographic Study, said the slight drop in ethnic Jewish affiliation "may reflect changes in the way people approach the ethnicity question itself. For instance, Jews may be increasingly more inclined to say they are Canadian rather than Jewish when it comes to ethnicity."

Demographers say that identifying with Judaism as an ethnicity tends to occur among those who are less religiously observant. Thus, planners expect there will be higher levels of "ethnic" Jews in British Columbia than in Quebec, where "religious" Jews will show up in stronger numbers than ethnic ones.

UIAFC Executive Vice-President Maxyne Finkelstein, was also skeptical about the latest ethnicity figures. "Several informal indicators suggest that the Canadian Jewish community is in fact growing and flourishing: Jewish day school attendance has increased in a number of communities; all of the major Jewish campaigns have shown financial gains; and JIAS has seen a decade of continuous immigration," she said.

"We shouldn't jump to conclusions… given that we are operating with incomplete information" until the release of the religion data, she said.

But Brym worries that the number of "religious" Jews may drop too.

"Jews by religion are Jews by ethnicity, but not all Jews by ethnicity are Jews by religion," he said. The ethnic numbers "are the best measure we have in the broadest sense."

With stable Jewish birthrates and "depleted" immigration from South Africa and the former Soviet Union, the community could be in for a shock in the spring if the religion numbers also show a decline, or at least not the increase that was expected, Brym said.

Figures for religion have traditionally been lower than those for ethnicity, he noted.

After the 1996 headcount, Brym sounded alarms at how many more "ethnic" Jews had listed multiple ethnic origins compared to the 1991 census.

At the time, he warned that the trend reflected increased assimilation, because more people were identifying themselves as Jewish but also as having several other origins.

Brym now says he's moderated that view.

"Assimilation is perhaps too strong a word. It does indicate an awareness of membership in other groups, and a greater degree of comfort and borrowing from other groups and cultures. Being Jewish is a much more complex reality than it used to be."

Jews in Canada "feel comfortable. We have low levels of anti-Semitism, a lot of mixing and low fertility. So what should we expect [but a decline]?"

Brym said one thing will be all but certain when the religion statistics are released in the spring: Muslims in Canada will far outnumber Jews, which he says is "of concern" because "a major source of anti-Semitism is in the Islamic community."

* * *

Despite the decline in Jewish numbers nationally, Ontario and Toronto continue to see increases.

The 2001 census figures show 196,260 Jews by ethnic origin in Ontario, up from the 191,000 who said the same thing in 1996, an increase of three per cent.

The 1991 census showed 175,000 Jews in Ontario by religion.

Toronto and environs continue to be Canada's Jewish hub: The 2001 tally found 161,215 Jews by ethnicity in and around the city.

By comparison, the 1991 census found 156,000 Jews by ethnic origin in Toronto and 151,000 Jews by religion.

In Montreal, 80,390 cited Jewish ethnic origins in 2001, a drop of 11 per cent from 1996, when the figure was 89,905. Jews are now the city's 7th largest ethnic group.

In Vancouver, where 22,130 said they were ethnically Jewish in 2001, a very slight drop from 22,225 in 1996, Jews ranked as that city's 24th largest ethnic community.

IDF experts say intifadah violence has passed its peak

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily News Ltd.

Analysis

Senior IDF sources believe violence in the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians has peaked. They also feel that an American offensive against Iraq would put pressure on Palestinians to cease all acts of terrorism against Israel.

These conclusions come from a recent analysis by the Defence Ministry that point to the influence of the proposed "road map" for a peaceful solution of the conflict, and to a parallel effort to calm the Israel-Palestinian conflict that would come immediately after an attack on Iraq. The Americans will propose alternatives to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat as Palestinian leader, the sources believe.

The IDF analysts say the peak of the violence has passed, although serious security concerns and warnings will continue as efforts are made to carry out more Palestinian terrorist attacks against Israel. The Defence Ministry analysts don't believe the conflict will end in 2003, but they do think there is now an opportunity for achieving calm.

War in Iraq is expected to cause "an earthquake" in the Middle East, with fallout very difficult to assess at this time, but that may include the creation of conditions for negotiating with the Palestinians – assuming they reach the conclusion that Israel will not succumb to violence.

However, the assessment believes that Arafat remains "an effective leader" in that he is capable of neutralizing any new efforts by Palestinians to engineer a "quiet overthrow" aimed at ending the violence and removing Arafat from the centres of power.

According to an Israeli security source, senior figures in the Palestinian Authority have already managed to present Arafat with a challenge regarding both internal Palestinian talks over a ceasefire, and in refusing to acknowledge the authority of his new cabinet at the Palestinian Legislative Council last September.

However, whenever Arafat has recognized some movement to undermine his absolute control, he has taken steps to quash it. The IDF believes Arafat is still not interested in a genuine ceasefire and is therefore doing everything in his power to undercut any sort of cohesion in the talks between the Palestinian factions now being held in Cairo.

When the talks began a few months ago, Hamas sent a senior representative, Khaled Mashal, to Cairo, on the understanding that the radical Islamic organization would not be able to avoid a ceasefire. However, Arafat refused to authorize the departure of his deputy Abu Mazen to the talks, signaling to Hamas leaders that he does not believe they need to make any concessions.

By last October, leaders of Tanzim, the Fatah paramilitary organization in the northern West Bank, among them Tanzim leader Majid al-Masri (since under arrest by the security services) considered a ceasefire. Masri said he had even met a representative of the European Union with an idea for freezing attacks. However, he concluded that "the views of the leader" on the matter had changed, and he resumed the task of guiding terrorists toward Israeli targets.

IDF operates in Gaza; 13 Palestinians killed

By AMOS HAREL and ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Thirteen Palestinians were killed Sunday in an Israel Defence Forces raid into Gaza meant to end the Palestinian rocket and mortar attacks on the Negev and settlements inside the Gaza Strip.

Just hours after the raid, Qassam rockets landed in Sderot, but there were no casualties and no damage was done.

The raid, which began late Saturday night, was dubbed Hot Iron and was the largest military operation in the area since the start of the intifadah. Beginning shortly after midnight, the raid was met by Palestinian gunmen who tried unsuccessfully to repel it. There were no Israeli casualties during the raid into Gaza City, but 13 Palestinians, all in their early 20s, were killed as the army conducted operations until early morning. Resistance included anti-tank rockets and landmines, small arms fire and hand grenades.

Givati troops, armoured corps, engineering corps and officer cadets all took part in the operation, which was backed by helicopters that flew over the city of 300,000 as the fighting took place. The soldiers rolled into the Zeitun neighbourhood aboard tanks and armoured personnel carriers, and when the operation was over, the army reported that some 100 workshops where primitive Qassam rockets and mortars were manufactured had been destroyed.

But Palestinian sources said the army also destroyed a plant that manufactures trash cans for the municipality, carpentry shops, sweatshops that produce clothing, grocery stores and other shops along the main streets of the neighbourhood.

Roads were crumpled under tank treads, and telephone and electricity poles were knocked down.

The most wide-scale damage took place in a market crowded with hundreds of small shops that sell clothes in the neighbourhood of east Seja, much of which went up in flames. There were no people in the market at the time of the fire, but the gunfire reportedly set alight dozens of warehouses that burned to the ground.

Israelis, Palestinians plan conference of mayors

By MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — To promote joint Israeli-Palestinian projects, Israeli and Palestinian mayors decided Sunday to hold an international conference in 2003, with some 1,000 mayors from all over the world.

The decision was made at a meeting of Israeli and Palestinian mayors in The Hague. The Israeli representatives were Local Authorities Union chair Adi Eldar and Rishon Letzion Mayor Meir Nitzan; the Palestinians were represented by Nablus Mayor Gassan A-Shaqa and Rafah Mayor Said Zuarob.

The conference, which will be the first of its kind, is to take place in Israel and the Palestinian Authority and will be financed by the European Union and international organization of unions of local authorities. The mayors who attend must agree to sign a joint declaration of cooperation between the nations.

Eldar said that without such co-operation in the fields of education, welfare and the environment, "there is no chance of reducing the hostility between the two sides." The conference is conditional on a statement of understanding being signed by local leaders and the approval of the Israeli and Palestinian unions of local authorities.

Parliamentarians witness a troubled Mideast

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With Israeli elections and a war with Iraq looming in the background, members of four out of Canada's five federal parties spent last week in Israel in order to increase their understanding of the Mideast conflict.

Twenty representatives from the Labour party, the Canadian Alliance, the Progressive Conservative party and the Bloc Quebecois travelled around the country, on a Canada-Israel Committee sponsored trip, meeting dignitaries, speaking to security experts and seeing Hezbollah's soldiers at Israel's northern border.

The trip "presented a comprehensive well balanced perspective of the problem," said Liberal MP Art Eggleton.

"It brought home the stark reality of what Israel faces" on its many borders, he said, adding that it was clear that "Lebanon doesn't have control of its territory."

On the fifth day of their visit, the delegates stopped at various Israeli army outposts, where they saw soldiers monitor radar screens for suspicious activity, and watched recorded videos taken last year of terrorists trying to cross the Lebanese border into Israel.

The bus travelled further north and stopped at the barbed wire fence that divides Israel from Lebanon. From the Israeli military base positioned at the border, the delegation could look into the area that Israel pulled out of two years ago.

On the other side of the fence, almost within reach, a United Nations observers' base and a Hezbollah concrete bunker stood side by side. Atop the bunker flapped a yellow Hezbollah "Party of God" flag under which stood a guard, dressed in black from head to toe, with only his eyes visible through the narrow slits of his black balaclava.

Nowhere in sight was a Lebanese flag. Instead, a large billboard faced the Israeli side of the border with pictures of mutilated bodies. Across the bottom, Hebrew words stated tauntingly, "[Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon, remember your soldiers are still in Lebanon."

Less than 20 minutes later, the bus stopped at the town of Raja, a dusty, dreary, tense town that is governed by Israel on one side and Lebanon on the other. Raja overlooks the Hazbani River which flows into the Sea of Galilee, a major source of water for Israel.

From Raja, it was easy to see the Lebanese water supply station on the other side of the hill. Directly below, on the banks of the river, stood a water diverting station – flying a Hezbollah flag.

An Israeli army spokesperson who was with the group said that Hezbollah has not yet diverted any water to Lebanon.

"It must be very difficult for Israeli soldiers to face real life representatives of a group whose mandate it is to destroy their nation," said Canadian Alliance foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day, adding that "this is time for all people to show courage."

"This isn't just a war against terrorism, this is a war against free democratic living.

"It's important for the western world not to accommodate this kind of tyranny, and to help all people trapped in oppressive regimes," Day said, adding that now is the time for "Canada to lead the wave of vocal opposition."

PC Senator David Tkachuk expressed concern over the fact that most Canadians don't have any idea of what Israel is up against.

For some reason, "all aspects of the situation aren't being presented," he said, adding that "perhaps the story is so complex that the media has trouble reporting it."

Tkachuk also said Canada should play a more vocal role in the United Nations.

The delegation also spent an afternoon in Ramallah, where they heard from Nabeel Kassis, the Palestinian Authority's minister of tourism, and Michael Tarazi, legal advisor to the Palestine Liberation Organization.

In a question-and-answer session, Kassis told the group that anti-Semitism "does not exist" in the West Bank and Gaza and that the harassment of Christians by Muslim leaders is "absolute nonsense."

"This is a conflict between occupier and occupied," Tarazi said, adding that the Palestinians did not want to sign the agreements at Camp David and Taba because the Israelis were trying to create "reservations" and retain strategic holdings.

Soon after the break in talks in the summer of 2000, the current intifadah began.

Bloc Quebecois MP Madeleine Dalphond-Guiral said she sensed a constant apprehension on both sides of the conflict.

A mutual agreement needs to be developed to resolve the problem, she said, adding that right now the two parties are not even close.

Dalphond-Gurial said she was especially affected by a panel discussion, held earlier in the week, where CBC correspondent Neil MacDonald and Jerusalem Post editor Amotz Aza-El fought over the use of the word "terrorist."

For MacDonald, omitting the word "terrorist" from his broadcasts was a matter of levelling the playing field. He said he believes in Massachusetts Institute of Technology linguistics and philosophy professor Noam Chomsky's theories that the media must stop serving "as the guard dog of the establishment."

For Aza-El, the word signified that "innocent civilians were being blown up by suicide bombers."

"If two journalists fight over the use of one word, how will we ever reduce the level of apprehension?" Dalphond-Guiral asked.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest .

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2003 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 21, 2003. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 28, 2003.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 13, 2003. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

CBC's Middle East correspondent at the centre of new controversy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The head of the Israeli Government Press Office (GPO) is backing an assertion by HonestReporting.com, an Israeli media watchdog, that CBC Middle East correspondent Neil Macdonald spearheaded an effort to boycott the GPO's annual new year reception in Jerusalem.

Both the CBC and the Foreign Press Association (FPA) reject that assertion, saying Macdonald was only one of many Israel-based reporters who discussed the boycott option as a way to protest GPO policy. They say he did not take a leadership role in the debate.

In the end, the FPA's board decided not to attend the reception, and Macdonald, who was returning to Israel from a business meeting in Toronto, also missed the event. Some CBC personnel based in Israel attended the prime minister's press conference, which was part of the reception but took place later in the evening.

After investigating the issue, the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), which has been highly critical of Macdonald's coverage of the Arab-Israeli conflict, told its members it found no evidence that Macdonald pushed for a boycott of the prime minister's speech. "The CIC now considers the matter closed."

'The CIC now considers the matter closed'

The controversy was sparked when HonestReporting.com, a two-year-old grassroots organization, sent a mass e-mailing to its subscribers under the headline, "Canadian TV journalist schemes to embarrass Israel's Prime Minister."

The posting includes an excerpt of an e-mail sent by Macdonald during the FPA discussions.

"On an official level, let the FPA send a single representative to the reception," Macdonald suggested. "Meanwhile, I intend to be absent. And I urge my colleagues to find other work that day, too."

Shraga Simmons, a member of the editorial board of HonestReporting.com, said his reading of the e-mail exchanges indicated Macdonald was one of two leading FPA members who advocated a boycott of the reception.

"My first reaction to it was that it seemed to violate the first rule of journalism, to report the news and not become the news... I think he was trying to create a publicity stunt" and embarrass the prime minister. The GPO is part of the Prime Minister's Office, he pointed out.

CBC spokesperson Ruth-Ellen Soles rejected suggestions Macdonald was a boycott leader. What's more, she said, the FPA boycott was limited to the party earlier in the evening, not to the prime minister's news conference.

"Attendance at the news conference was never at issue," the CBC told HonestReporting.com in a written reply. "No one ever suggested that – not the FPA or the CBC. There was never any doubt that CBC would attend the conference."

Simmons said the CBC was wrongly claiming there were two distinct events that night, when in fact the GPO presented the evening as a single event.

GPO director Danny Seaman, meanwhile, took a tougher line.

"I don't care about the boycott or Neil Macdonald," he said. "We had a reception with the prime minister and it was a success."

Seaman said he read the FPA correspondence and believes Macdonald was one of two journalists who led the boycott effort. "He's always been treated with the utmost respect by the Israeli authorities," he said. "I think his behaviour... reflects badly on the CBC.

"The attempt to boycott was ridiculous, infantile and a total failure. More journalists were there than ever before."

Seaman said Macdonald was demonstrating "chutzpah" by pushing for a boycott "while asking for a press pass for Palestinian stringers [freelancers] to go through Israeli checkpoints."

The FPA is advocating on behalf of Palestinian stringers, Seaman said, because "they know if they tick off Palestinians, they'd lose access and contacts."

The GPO and the FPA have been at loggerheads for at least a year, since the Israeli government decided to withhold special passes to Palestinians working for foreign media outlets in Israel. Seaman said residents of the Palestinian territories are not citizens of Israel and have no right to work there. "We believe they're not operating as professional journalists. If you understand the nature of the Palestinian Authority, you realize they can't work independently."

The stringers are either sympathetic to the Palestinian cause or are threatened by local authorities, he said.

Tami Allen-Frost, vice-chair of the FPA, said the association "has had a problem with the GPO over the past 18 months over a number of issues." The FPA wants the GPO to issue stringers with documentation to allow them to enter Israel to work and to allow them to pass through Israeli checkpoints in the Palestinian territories. Foreign journalists are also being stopped too often at checkpoints, she said.

Palestinian stringers are important because foreign journalists are not always familiar with the Palestinian areas and they need helpers to "find their way around." In Hebron, for example, "if you don't know your way around, you can get caught up in a dangerous area," she said.

Allen-Frost, a producer for the British television network, ITN, said the FPA membership had been discussing the boycott as a way of making its point. Macdonald participated in the debate, "but he was not the leader."

Seaman said the GPO is aware of the media's concerns. Reuters has even asked the Israeli High Court of Justice to order the government to issue Palestinians press credentials, he said.

"It's ridiculous to issue press credentials to our sworn enemies," he said. Israel remains a sovereign country that alone will determine who can enter. The media working in Israel have more freedom than the press in any other war zone. And considering the number of roadblocks in the Palestinian territories and the hundreds of potential "points of contact," the number of incidents involving foreign reporters is minor, he said.

The reporters' problem is that they have to operate in areas controlled by Palestinians. There, they are subject to intimidation and the Palestinian stringers they rely upon "are totally biased.

"Anything else said by them is pure nonsense."

OVER 45TH YEAR LEISURE TIME TOURS

Pianist hopes for So Much with his new album

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Jazz pianist Ron Davis says he's had three lives. Davis had always planned on being a musician, but at his parents' urging, he went into law. The next detour came when Davis became an assistant professor of French after receiving his PhD in French linguistics. But Davis eventually returned to his original plan, and with the launch of his second album So Much he's hoping to scale new heights in his music career.

"While my first CD (soloduotrio) was my calling card to the world, the new CD has a much broader scope and ambition," Davis said. "We have our eyes on not only bringing the music across Canada, but internationally as well. This CD is more of an international intent."

The Ron Davis Trio.

To realize this goal, Davis is planning a European tour, during which he hopes to stop in Israel.

"I have a special desire to bring the music to Israel," he said. "As a Jew, it means something special to visit Israel and play there; it would be wonderful to make music in the land of my ancestors."

Davis returned to music professionally six years ago after a career as a lawyer and a four-year stint as an assistant professor of French at the University of Toronto. Davis said his other careers have definitely had an impact on his life as a musician.

"Playing music is not just about execution and proficiency. Playing music is about personality and presenting a face," he said. "I think one of the reasons we connect with the audience is because I have a wide and varied background."

Davis performs regularly at music clubs in Toronto and also plays at simchahs and corporate events. Ironically, Davis has been performing at law firms, playing both for lawyers he has worked with in the past and lawyers he has worked against.

"In some cases, they [lawyers] have said 'I envy you. I wish I could pursue my passion,'" he said.

Davis' first album, soloduotrio, was released in 2001 and received play on radio stations such as the CBC, CKLN and Jazz-FM 91.1.

On So Much Davis teams up with bass player Drew Birston and drummer Mark Mariash – the three are collectively known as the Ron Davis Trio.

So Much features vocalist Lori Cullen. Davis' brother Milton Davis, a litigation lawyer in Toronto, is the album's executive producer.

Davis said he plans to go to the studio with his trio this year to do an instrumental recording. He also hopes to find a good manager. "I feel I have something the public can connect with," Davis said. "I feel there's a wider audience for my music."

So Much will be released Feb. 3 at the Montreal Bistro in Toronto (65 Sherbourne St.). Ron Davis can be contacted through his Web site, www.rddavis.com.

Foreign Affairs issues advisory to Canadians in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT) is advising Canadians living in Israel to have their documents in order in case they must leave Israel on short notice.

The recently issued advisory comes on top of an earlier DFAIT "travel report" which suggests "Canadians should defer all tourist travel to Israel. Other Canadians should evaluate carefully the implications for their security and safety before deciding to travel, due to the risk of further terrorist activity."

DFAIT spokesman Reynald Doiron downplayed the significance of the new advisory, saying it is no more than "a heads-up at a very basic minimum.

"It's common sense and prudence to have travel documents ready," he said. "It's just a reminder. It's the basic minimum, given the fact you have terrorist attempts and bombs going off in bars and restaurants."

Doiron said the advisory was the least urgent of four levels of warning.

Michael Bell, Canada's ambassador to Israel, issued the advisory in light of a possible war with Iraq. During the 1991 Gulf War, Iraq launched 39 Scud missiles at Israel.

DFAIT's consular affairs Web site (www.voyage.gc.ca) also advised Canadians not to travel to the West Bank or Gaza Strip. These areas "continue to be affected by serious violence. Canadians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip should leave as they are at high risk," DFAIT states.

Moscow choir returns for one night only

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

After performing for sold out North American audiences last year, the internationally acclaimed Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir will return to Toronto for one performance on its 2003 North American tour.

The choir will perform a new program of songs and choreography ranging from cantorial to Broadway tunes and modern jazz, in nine languages including Yiddish, Hebrew, Italian, French, Russian and English.

The group of 11 soloist tenors, led by performer/artist director Michael Turetsky, will perform in Toronto on Feb. 23 at 7 p.m. at Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St.

The Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir was created in 1989 as part of a program to revive the art of cantor and choir music of the synagogues in Russia.

Winners of the world Cantors Gold Crown Award, the choir has performed throughout Russia, Europe, Israel and North America.

They have appeared with international virtuosity such as Placido Domingo and Zubin Mehta and in large venues such as Carnegie Hall.

"We are very fortunate to be able to bring this exceptional choir here. They have left an impression wherever they perform," says producer; Ella Tcheloznova, who is bringing the choir to Toronto.

Tickets range from $25 to $55. For more information or for tickets, call 416-491-3014 or 416-226-9151.

Visit to New York is all relative

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — How does a physicist, whose Nobel Prize-winning work was done while he worked in a Swiss Patent Office, become a timeless icon?

That the two most recognizable faces of the modern age are those of Albert Einstein and Marilyn Monroe is undeniable, but odd. After all, $E=mc^2$ is not a particularly sexy equation; furthermore, few people can really claim to understand it.

So the current show (till August 10) about Einstein at the American Museum of Natural History in New York is the place to go for answers about both the man and the thinker.

As we enter the exhibit, our images are reflected on a screen, as we would look if a black hole were getting in the way. Drawn irresistibly to these distortions, we literally approach the revolutionary nature of the Einstein's science.

"Newton Overthrown" screamed a Times of London headline when Einstein's theories were proven during a 1919 solar eclipse After the press plunged him overnight into science's first rank, he never left the public stage.

Yet the German-born, Swiss-educated Einstein confessed that he felt like a "lone traveler," who "never belonged." At 16, this dreamy boy had wondered what it would be like to ride on a beam of light. A report card from his Swiss high school proves he got excellent marks in physics and algebra, thereby debunking the "Einstein was a lousy student" myth.

After promising his first wife Mileva his yet-to-be-awarded Nobel Prize money, he then married his Berlin cousin Elsa Loewenthal. Sadly he sounds less than an ideal parent to his sons from his first marriage.

Hans Albert Einstein called himself "the only project [my father] ever gave up on." In contrast to his spotty marital history, Einstein did grow into one of the premier social activists of his age, a conundrum that perhaps only Freud (with whom he corresponded) could have solved.

He and Elsa bought a house in Princeton in 1935, when he was established at the Institute for Advanced Study. A passionate sailor, he sailed with notepad at the ready to jot down ideas; played the violin, and searched assiduously for the Grand Unified Theory, or "Theory of Everything."

He was working on it when he died, in 1955. (Physicists today continue to do so.) Sometime during this period he acquired the gentle face and aureole of white hair that remains so familiar today.

He (and colleague Max Planck) had won the Nobel Prize for Physics in 1921, after the solar eclipse confirmed a prediction from General Theory of Relativity: that the Sun's gravity deflects light from distant stars. Einstein also proposed that light's speed is a universal constant, and that space and time are relative, not absolute.

Albert Einstein at Carnegie Hall in 1934.

"Lights All Askew in the Heavens" trumpeted the press. Einstein's imaginative theories challenged verities about light, gravity, time and space. Light-hearted clips from 1950s sci-fi movies about time travel reflect Einstein's grip on the popular imagination.

An up-to-the-minute kinetic light sculpture in the exhibit uses LED technology to show moving light patterns. Using an interactive "blackboard" we can delve more deeply into Einstein's discovery that energy can be converted to mass and vice versa—into the heart of the world's most famous equation. Helpfully, for the scientifically challenged, enthusiastic instructors are on hand to explain.

By the time of the Nazi terror, Einstein had become worried about the uses of his discoveries. Although firmly antiwar, he wrote to President Roosevelt in August, 1939, warning that the Nazis might use uranium to make a nuclear bomb. But J. Edgar Hoover considered Einstein too left-wing to be employed on the Manhattan Project.

Einstein later urged that the new bomb not be used against civilians; when this happened he expressed his outrage publicly. Although a humble man, he readily used his celebrity to battle issues like segregation, anti-Semitism, McCarthyism, and nuclear armament. As a result he had a thick FBI file all his own.

A committed Zionist, Einstein was a founder, with Sigmund Freud, Chaim Weizmann, Martin Buber and others, of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, which he made the beneficiary of his archives. Among the personal papers on view in New York is a letter from Abba Eban, writing to offer Einstein the Presidency of Israel. It's followed by Einstein's gracious letter of refusal.

> 'Abba Eban, writing to offer Einstein the Presidency of Israel'

There's much more to see in this enlightening exhibit; the museum also offers a series of workshops for both adults and kids. No matter how much you learn here about relativity, your understanding of Einstein the man is bound to grow rapidly, even if it doesn't quite match the speed of light.

IF YOU GO: To learn about the Einstein Exhibit; go to www.amnh.org or contact The American Museum of Natural History, Central Park West at 79th St., New York, New York, 10024-5192; Ph: 212-769-5800; FAX: 212-769-5006.

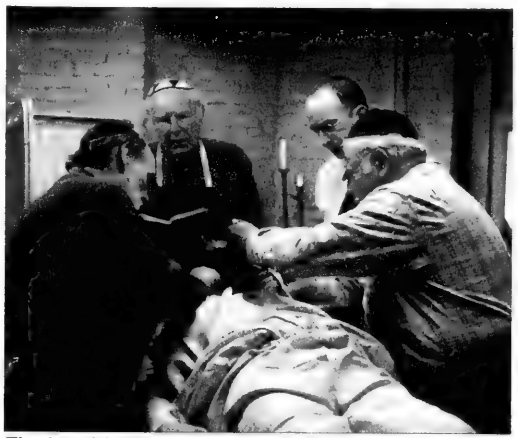
Intrigue, mystery and the chevrah kadishah

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

I've seen many movies in my life, but I admit a thriller that uses the chevrah kadishah at the centre of an intrigue involving the Jewish mafia is a first.

In The Burial Society, opening Jan. 31, Sheldon Kasner, a loans manager at the Hebrew National Bank, on the run from money launderers and the Jewish underworld, winds up seeking sanctuary with an exclusive clan of older men in the chevrah kadishah – a group that prepares the dead for burial.



The chevrah kadishah teaches Sheldon Kasner (second from right) the ropes of traditional Jewish burial in The Burial Society.

Although reluctant to take on a new member at first, the group of three older men decide that injecting younger blood into their group will help keep the tradition alive.

To test his resolve, they teach him the washing and dressing rituals, and when they realize he's determined to join them, they relent and take him in.

Of course, they're curious about his history, so in a flashback scene, Sheldon (Rob LaBelle) tells them about his former job at the Hebrew bank and how he was implicated in stealing $2 million dollars from a Jewish organized crime ring – which he says he didn't do.

But nothing in The Burial Society is as it seems. The movie moves frequently back and forth in time, and in another flashback scene, we see what really happened at the bank, and maybe quiet Sheldon isn't as innocent as he'd like everyone to believe.

For his first feature movie, director/writer Nicholas Racz uses a lot of techniques, from flashbacks to foreshadowing, symbolism, non-linear narrative and sudden plot twists.

After the opening scene in which Sheldon is dangling by his feet over a river as two men threaten to drop him, the viewer is left guessing where the movie is heading.

The movie's pace slows down for the next 30 minutes or so. We're shown detailed scenes of the ritual washing and dressing of a corpse as we enter the world of the chevrah kadishah.

But then the movie explodes as we meet Sheldon's brother Morry (played by veteran actor David Paymer), his face beaten black and blue.

Like an onion, layers of the plot are slowly peeled back until the end reveals all.

Is the building superintendent really just that? Is Sheldon really an innocent, unhappy banker looking for spiritual meaning? Are the men in the chevrah kadishah really trying to protect Sheldon from harm?

As in the English thriller Shallow Grave, a fair bit of back-stabbing and deceit goes on, and the viewer is left wondering just who is telling the truth.

The last half-hour is frenzied and exciting, as the mystery is revealed; but I thought it got off to a rather slow start. That aside, fans of the mystery/thriller genre who like to keep guessing should enjoy this film. I look forward to Racz's next project.

The Burial Society was the winner of the CityTV Western Canada Screenwriters Award at the 2002 Vancouver International Film Festival.

Leading prostate disease expert to be honoured in June

One of Canada's leading prostate disease experts, Dr. John Trachtenberg, will be honoured at a gala dinner this spring, recognized for his clinical and research expertise.

Director of the Prostate Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital in Toronto, Trachtenberg will be recognized June 19 by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science (Weizmann Canada) and Princess Margaret Hospital.

"Dr. Trachtenberg is renowned in medical circles the world over," says Weizmann Canada chair H. Thomas Beck. "He has been instrumental in the development of new treatments for prostate cancer and has worked to create a greater awareness of the disease.

"Equally as important from our perspective is that he is conducting in Canada the first clinical trials of a new light-activated drug that was developed at the Weizmann Institute of Science."

Dr. John Trachtenberg

Trachtenberg holds the Fleck Tanenbaum Chair in Prostatic Diseases at the University Health Network and the University of Toronto, where he is a professor in the department of surgery and the department of medical imaging. He has published numerous papers and books, and is a member of many hospital and scientific committees in North America and Europe.

Trachtenberg has also led numerous clinical research trials into less-invasive alternatives to standard surgery or radiation treatment for prostate cancer, from using microwaves to combat the disease, to the current Phase I/II trial of a light-activated drug developed by Weizmann Institute scientists Avigdor Scherz and Yoram Salomon.

"This kind of international collaboration serves as an excellent example of how leaders in science and medicine can unite in the common cause of innovative cancer research," says Beck.

"We are very proud of Dr. Trachtenberg and others in the Princess Margaret Hospital team developing new treatments for prostate cancer," says Neville Kirchmann, president and CEO of The Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation.

The gala honouring Trachtenberg is scheduled for the Sheraton Centre Hotel in Toronto. Funds raised will go to the establishment of a new research chair at the Weizmann Institute of Science and will help fund research and treatment initiatives at Princess Margaret Hospital.

The Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation works with health-care and research professionals, patients, their families and the community to secure the financial resources necessary to enhance and support research, patient care and education initiatives at Princess Margaret Hospital.

The Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel, is one of the world's foremost centres of scientific research and graduate study. Its 2,500 scientists, graduate students and technicians from more than 32 countries pursue a multitude of sophisticated research projects to fight disease and hunger, protect the environment and harness alternative sources of energy.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am hooked on flax seed now, since I read your article about it. Do you have any other "favourite" foods to recommend that are healthy?

A. I am so glad that you asked this question because I do have two great foods that are fairly unusual for most people to recommend.

The first is wheatberries or soft wheat kernels. These are barley-shaped grains that taste more like rice than barley and are very healthful. Wheatberries are the whole wheat kernel, so you get all of the fibre and protein too. They also happen to be absolutely delicious. To cook, you have to boil one cup of wheatberries with two cups water, then simmer for one hour. (Rinse the wheatberries before cooking.) Wheatberries are available in most bulk food stores.

You can either serve them hot (I drizzle them with olive oil, salt and pepper) or serve them at room temperature as a salad. There are lots of recipes for wheatberry salads in cookbooks or you can improvise with your favourite ingredients. I add green onion, cherry tomatoes, olive oil, soy sauce and fresh black pepper. The whole family will like these.

The second thing I really love is almond butter. It is like peanut butter but much healthier – almond butter has more mono-unsaturated fat (heart-healthy fat); it also has fibre, calcium and omega 3s, and is a healthy, protein-rich substitution for peanut butter.

Q. Is chocolate milk a good snack for my kids?

A. Chocolate milk is a fine snack for most kids. While it does have more calories and sugar than white milk, it is also full of calcium and protein, and if it's the only way to get your kids to drink milk, then it's an excellent choice.

Q. Can you suggest some healthy after-school snacks for my kids? They are six, nine and 11.

A. Try hot chocolate (made with milk), soup, veggies and dip, baked nachos and salsa, baked apples, cheese and crackers, yogurt sundaes (soft or frozen yogurt with your kids' favourite toppings), grilled cheese on whole wheat bread, low-fat rice pudding or fruit, along with a glass of milk. All of these will be satisfying cold weather after-school snacks.

Greater Toronto Area

'We support fundamental democratic reforms'

CJN: How would Canada's domestic policy priorities change with the Alliance leading the country?

Harper: We're a party that tends to favour free enterprise and smaller government solutions to economic and social problems. In terms of surpluses, lower taxes is our higher priority rather than increased spending in areas where we do see increased spending, like health care. Yes, we want to maintain a system of public health insurance – we want to supplement that with private investment to support those public services as the governments of Ontario and Alberta and many others are doing.

We support fundamental democratic reforms to give people more say – we want to see senators elected, free votes in the House of Commons, direct democratic mechanisms. We tend to be a party that's much stronger on law and order and control of criminal activity.

CJN: What are you doing to personally prepare yourself for the job of prime minister if you are elected?

Harper: There are all kinds of things I'm trying to do – get my party prepared, get my office prepared. Obviously, there are big changes for my family. Our strategy is to balance work and family life, to stay healthy, get exercise. The short answer is, yes, there's a lot of determination and hard work and focus, but at the same time, I can't emphasize enough the need to maintain balance in one's own life and perspective and family, spirituality, fitness – all of those things are part of that preparation.

CJN: What qualities do you have that would make you a good prime minister for this country?

Harper: I think other people have to answer that for you. I know where I'd like to see the country go and I personally tend to have a record of success at most of the things I've done and in bringing people together certainly within our party to achieve these objectives. Ultimately, the voters themselves and the people who work with me will have to make their evaluation of my skills.

On Campus

In a news release, Daniel Held, the Israel Affairs co-ordinator of York's Jewish Student Federation, said, "It's very positive for the university to let him speak. They've made a decision that will further perpetuate freedom of speech on campus."

The university's Middle Eastern Student Association (MESA), the main dissenters over Pipes' appearance, object particularly to Pipe's Campus-Watch Web site (www.campus-watch.org), which monitors and critiques specific professors and universities on their approach to Mideast studies.

Campuses are places of civil debate and civic discourse, said Kaye. "Irrespective of the views of any academic, it's important to have the opportunity to hear these viewpoints."

Kaye said he felt good about Marsden's decision and recognized the pressures she was facing both from MESA and because of security concerns. "The spectre of Concordia is uppermost in everybody's minds," he said. "They are taking all the precautions necessary [to prevent the violence that occurred at Concordia University when Israeli Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu came to speak last Sept. 9]."

Ed Morgan, chair of CJC, Ontario region, said that while he was pleased with the outcome of the negotiations, "the whole episode is a signal as to how careful we have to be on our campuses to allow real debate to flourish and to not be deceived into thinking that mainstream debate has to be censored."

Pipes is a "genuine scholar," said Morgan. "One can disagree or agree with him, but he's a genuine scholar... He's not a political activist."

Tennis whiz the world's best in her age group

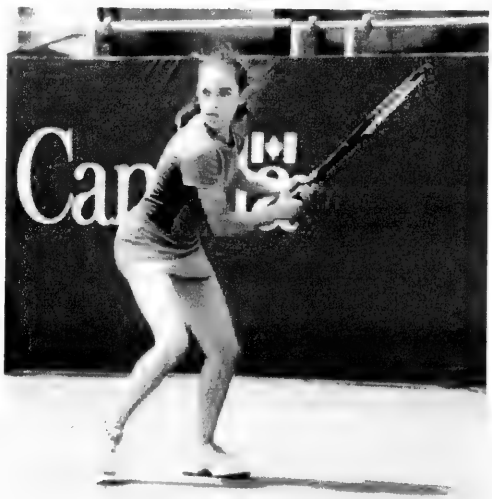
By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — Sharon Fichman of Toronto became Canada's most promising tennis star by winning the Orange Bowl (OB) International Tennis Championships in the 12 and under category in Miami recently.

The 12-year-old tennis whiz became the first Canadian to win this prestigious tournament since Carling Basset-Seguso won the title in 1979. Basset-Seguso went on to become Canada's best woman tennis player ever, ranked as high as eighth in the world in 1985.

The victory in what the Ontario Tennis Association touts as "the unofficial world championships," means Fichman can now be considered the best 12-year old tennis player in the world. She earned the title by demolishing six of the best players in her peer group and not giving up a set in all her matches.

In the final, Fichman rolled past Tamira Paszek of Austria 6-3,6-1 to win the trophy. Her victory was no mere fluke – Fichman also won the Eddie Herr International Junior Championships in Brandenton, Fla., with the same ease two weeks earlier, easily defeating Jane Nowe in the final 6-2, 6-1.



"I went to the Orange Bowl and Herr tournaments not expecting to do better than a semi-final finish," said Fichman. "I wanted to test myself against players who grind it out, put opponents away with the short ball and who were bigger and stronger than me."

In the end, Fichman looked as if she was in a league of her own. She placed her shots well, made few unforced errors and outran her opponents to secure her title. By winning the Orange Bowl championships, Fichman has joined a long list of tennis greats, including Mary Joe Fernandez, Gabriela Sabatini, John McEnroe and Andrea Jaeger, who have won the OB 12 and under title.

Despite tremendous success at an early age, Fichman has not let her accomplishments in tennis change her daily life – at least not yet.

"I know Carling Basset achieved her success by going to Florida when she was young. I love Toronto, my school, my friends, and I don't want to leave. By playing in a lot of international junior tournaments on a lot of surfaces, I am not missing out on anything by staying at home," she said.

The Grade 7 student at Forest Hill Public School trains three hours a day with coach Ben Armstrong at the Mayfair Indoor Tennis Club during the winter and at the Toronto Lawn and Tennis Club during the summer. She has competed all over the world in junior tournaments, dominating on grass, clay, hard and indoor surfaces. Over the past year, in addition to the Orange Bowl and Herr titles, Fichman won four other titles in France, Canada and the United States.

Her goal is to be ranked among the top 50 in the world as a pro, and she looks to tennis player Martina Hingis as her role model.

"Martina is so graceful and achieved so much by 16. I don't say I will be where she was at 16, but my feeling is that if other players can do well, so can I," said Fichman.

Her father Robert, a computer program specialist who was born in Romania and lived in Israel, does not want his daughter to lose focus.

"Sharon understands there is a lot of work ahead of her for her to become a pro. Winning the Orange Bowl 12 and under is just a beginning and I want her to have a balance between school and tennis," he said.

"She had an opportunity to go to England and France to compete in junior tournaments there, but we decided that she would miss too much school if she went, so she declined to go," he added.

Fichman was born in Toronto two years after her parents immigrated to Canada from Israel in 1988. Her parents came to Israel after leaving Romania in 1983.

"I wanted to leave the communist society in Romania and was fortunate to leave. My family and I left Israel because of the recession there," Robert Fichman said.

Sharon Fichman started tennis at age five following her brother Thomas, who is a top Canadian player in the 14 and under group. Within a few years, she was beating girls and boys in her age group regularly in local tournaments.

Fichman's victories in Florida have made her think long and hard about her future. She could choose, as Carling Basset did, to turn pro early, or she could earn a tennis scholarship at a prestigious American university.

Fichman intends to pursue a tennis scholarship. "I want to go to UCLA in California because of its outstanding tennis program. I will have the opportunity of going to school and competing in tennis."

Fichman, who recently celebrated her bat mitzvah, expects to represent Canada in many international competitions, including the World Maccabiah Games in Israel scheduled for 2005.

Israel to play 'home' soccer games in Palermo

By ASHER GOLDBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The long, nervous wait is over. Italian soccer authorities last week confirmed Israel will be allowed to host its coming Euro 2004 Group One qualifier matches in Palermo in April.

A fax that came to the home of Israel Football Association (IFA) chair Gavri Levi was the last piece needed in a complicated puzzle that has seen Israel "almost" host games at several locations throughout Europe.

The faxed letter, signed by Italian Football Association (FA) chief Franco Carrero, gave Israel permission to use the Sicilian capital, Palermo, to host games between the Israeli national team and France on April 2 and Cyprus on April 30.

Levi had arranged a meeting with officials of the Italian FA for this week to settle technical, financial and security issues. Only afterward will the IFA be able to inform UEFA, European soccer's governing body, that it has secured all the necessary provisions in order to host the matches. The deadline for notification to UEFA is Jan. 31.

UEFA has refused to sanction home games in Israel because of the security situation.

"I am very pleased," Levi said. "It turns out that it was worth waiting for this. In the end, it has all worked out well."

Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

סדק מאת: ליאורה כרמלי

סדק הוא מסוג ספרי הילדים שנועד גם למבוגרים; זו הסיבה כנראה שהספר לא מנוקד. הדוברת בסדק היא ילדה והילדה מספרת על סבתא האוהבת והאהובה. "אני יושבת בחדר של סבתא שלי. גם היא יושבת בחדר."

בספר מתוחכם זה אפשר לשמוע את חדממה וגם את התנועה; התנועה היא סערת מחשבתה של הנכדה.

פיסית, סבתא כל כך דוממת וסטטית שלילדה נדמה "שסבתא נמצאת בתוך תמונה, ולכן היא לא זזה ולא מדברת." ואולם, מדי יום, מתוך אהבה לסבתא, הילדה מתעקשת להיכנס לתוך התמונה. "אני מתיישבת על הכיסא היחיד שיש בחדרה, ושותקת אתה בתוך המסגרת." לילדה חוש התבוננות, סבלנות ורגישות רבה. היא יושבת עם סבתא, בוחנת את הריהוט והחפצים המאכלסים את חדרה של סבתא, מזדהה עמה ("ישתינו יושבות אחת ליד השנייה מול הדלת הסגורה ומחרישות") ותוך כדי הזדהות מנסה לחדור למהותה של חדמות הדוממת.

האב לא מבין את העניין; "איך אפשר לא לפתוח את הפה שנה שלמה?" האם מסבירה: "אפשר... כשלא רוצים לחיות עוד." והילדה כולה בבהלה; אם סבתא תמשיך לשתוק, היא תמות מהר יותר!: אם כך, היא חייבת לעשות משהו. "יאבל איך אפשר לגרום לה לדבר? אפשר להכריח לאכול ולשתות ולהתרחץ, אבל לדבר?"

המרכיב הנוסף המהותי לתוכן הסיפור הוא הסדק בקיר. בעצם הסדק מקביל לחשיבתה המתפתלת של הנכדה. לא ברור לדובדת מתי הסדק נוצר. אולי, תוהה הילדה, הקיר נסדק מרוגז? אך "רוגז על מה? על הרעש שלי או על השקט שלהּ? על העומס בצד שלי או על הריק בצד שלהּ? או אולי הקיר נסדק מבלבול?"

הסוף נפלא! יום אחד כאשר הילדה דווקא בחדרה שלה, נפתחת הדלת למחצה וסבתא עומדת בפתח. "שערה הכסוף-כחלחל אסוף לאחור. עיניה התכולות-בהירות מביטות בי. חיוך מתנדנד על שפתיה. "אפשר להיכנס?" היא שואלת בקול קצת רועד.

"אפשר להיכנס?" שתי מלים מתוקות מדבש.

BROWN RICE, FRUIT AND NUT SALAD

1 1/4 cup	uncooked brown rice	2 tbls.	lemon juice
1/2 cup	coarsely chopped pitted dates	1 tbls.	white vinegar
1/2 cup	large pecan or walnut pieces	3 tbls.	olive or vegetable oil
1/4 cup	thinly sliced scallions	1/4 tsp.	cinnamon
2-3 tbls.	finely chopped fresh parsley	1/8 tsp.	ground ginger
1-2 tsp.	dried mint leaves	1 sm. can	drained mandarin oranges

In a medium saucepan bring 2 1/4 cups water to boil. Add rice, cover tightly, reduce heat to low, simmer 35-40 min. or until water is absorbed. Transfer rice to a large bowl; set aside to cool.

Add dates, walnuts, scallions, parsley and mint to rice. In a small bowl combine lemon juice, vinegar, oil, cinnamon and ginger. Pour over rice mixture; toss with a fork until mixed. Add half of the tangerines; mix gently. Arrange the salad on a platter or in a bowl, and garnish with the remaining oranges. Yield: 6 servings

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

The Ultimate Brownie Book by Bruce Weinstein ($25.95, Morrow) contains thousands of ways to make luscious brownies. A chocolate lover's dream, the awesome selection includes Gluten-Free Brownies, Brownie Pancakes, Brownie Cookies, Butterscotch Blondies – even fat-free and low-fat brownies. Short on time? Doctored-up brownie mixes include Brownie Mix Tiramisu.

These are simply the best brownies for lunchboxes, car trips or picnics. They cut cleanly, wrap up nicely and freeze well. Enjoy!

LUNCHBOX BROWNIES

- 1½ cups all-purpose flour, plus additional for pan
- 1 tsp. baking powder
- 1 tsp. salt
- ½ lb. (2 sticks) unsalted butter, plus additional for the pan, at room temperature
- 4 ounces unsweetened chocolate, chopped
- 2 cups sugar
- 3 large eggs, room temperature

Position rack in lower third of oven. Preheat oven to 350. Butter and flour a 9 x 13-inch baking pan; set aside.

In a medium bowl, whisk flour, baking powder and salt until well combined. Set aside.

Place butter and chocolate in a double boiler set over simmering water (or in a heat-safe bowl that fits snugly over a small pot of simmering water). Stir constantly until half the butter and chocolate are melted. Remove top of double boiler or bowl from pot; then continue stirring, away from the heat, until completely melted. Transfer to a large bowl; cool for 10 minutes.

Beat sugar into chocolate mixture with a whisk or electric mixer at medium speed; continue beating until mixture is smooth and sugar is completely dissolved, about 6 minutes by hand or 3 minutes with a mixer. Beat in eggs one at a time, allowing each to be thoroughly incorporated before adding the next. After beating in the third egg for 1 minute, beat in vanilla.

With a wooden spoon or rubber spatula, stir in flour mixture just until incorporated. Do not beat, although batter will be very thick. Spoon batter into prepared pan, spreading it gently to the corners. Bake for 30 minutes, or until a toothpick comes out with a few moist crumbs attached. Set pan on a wire rack; cool for 1 hour.

Cut brownies into 24 pieces while still in the pan. Carefully remove with an offset spatula. Serve immediately, or cool completely before covering with plastic wrap for storage at room temperature. They will stay fresh up to 2 days. Brownies can be tightly wrapped in wax paper, sealed in a freezer-safe bag and frozen up to 4 months; thaw at room temperature before serving.

Variations: Stir in 1¼ cups of any of the following along with flour mixture: Chopped honey-roasted walnuts, pecans, toasted hazelnuts, pine nuts, dried blueberries, cranberries, peanut butter chips, semi-sweet, milk or white chocolate chips, Kit Kat bars, raisinets.

Israel mourns a hero

By TSAHAR ROTEM and TAMARA TRAUBMAN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Forces was set to send a military rabbinate representative to Texas earlier this week to assist in identifying the body parts of the seven crew members of the space shuttle Columbia. The representative was to be a high-ranking officer who specializes in identifying casualties.

The IDF had not yet declared Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut, an IDF casualty. If parts of Ramon's body are not found, the chief military rabbi is authorized to classify Ramon as a soldier whose place of burial is not known.

Israeli and American flags were lowered to half-mast Sunday as a sign of mourning for Ramon and the six American astronauts aboard the shuttle Columbia, which exploded over Texas Saturday after a 16-day mission.

Along with Ramon, the shuttle, which was on its 28th mission, carried commander Rick Husband, pilot Willie McCool, mission specialists Dave Brown, Laurel Clark, Kalpana Chawla and payload commander Mike Anderson.

"Dreams in Tatters" read the headline in the Ma'ariv daily, above a full-page picture of the explosion and an inset showing a smiling, waving Ramon in his orange space suit.

"Crying over Ilan," declared Yediot Achronot above a similar image.

Ramon's brother and former classmates attended a memorial ceremony Sunday at Mekif Gimmel High School in Be'er Sheva, where Israel's first astronaut had studied.

Col. Ilan Ramon, 1954 - 2003

"Ilan was a hero, and yesterday afternoon, he became a legend," his school friend Reuven Segev told the students.

There are plans in Be'er Sheva to commemorate Ramon "by naming a street, a square or an institution in the city" after him, Mayor Yaakov Turner told Ha'aretz after the memorial ceremony.

Turner, who is also the head of the Israel Air Force Museum, said the museum would set up a memorial to Ramon beside that of missing airman Ron Arad.

In Haifa, a memorial was held for Ramon at the ORT technical high school in Kiryat Motzkin, a suburb of the northern port city. The school is to be renamed in honour of Ramon.

Six ORT students spent four years designing an experiment for Ramon – an examination of how near-zero gravity affects the growth of crystals – which he took with him into space.

Students covered desks with black table cloths, candles, cyclamen flowers and photo collages showing Ramon and the students working on the experiment. During breaks, many of the school's 1,500 students crowded around the exhibits.

Crying over Ilan

By BRADLEY BURSTON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — For Israelis, the last flight of a quiet hero was at once inconceivable and all too familiar – the unbearable juxtaposition of the tragedy of the Holocaust and the hopes of millions dashed without so much as the promise of a grave to grieve upon.

The tragedy struck Americans and Israelis at the same endless moment. But there was no way to translate the depth of the shock and grief in Israel, a country where shock and grief are so second nature that they are built into daily speech. How were Americans to comprehend a language, an entire culture, a sweepingly tragic historical tradition, in which the word for space, challal, can also mean a slain individual, and an immense, crushing emptiness.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Young Leaders to Meet

MONTREAL — UIA Federations Canada, Federation CJA's ProMontreal and the federation movement across Canada will host a conference for young Jewish leaders from around the world from April 4 to 6. Called "Imagine," it will feature speakers such as Dennis Prager and John Loftus and social events. For details, see www.imaginemontreal.com.

ISRAEL

Donkey Bomb

JERUSALEM — A booby-trapped donkey blew up near an Israeli bus in the West Bank Jan. 26, but no one was hurt. The blast occurred near a village in the Bethlehem area on a road leading to Israeli communities south of Jerusalem. Israeli officials believe terrorists waited for the bus to drive by before detonating explosives by remote control.

Soldier Dies

JERUSALEM — An Israeli soldier died Jan. 26 after being in a coma for almost 19 years. Sgt. Maj. Nadal Fero suffered massive injuries to his stomach in an April 1984 skirmish with Palestinian terrorists in Gaza, Ma'ariv reported. "The doctors didn't even think he would make it through one day, but he fought for almost 19 years, like a hero," his mother said.

Quiet Boycott

JERUSALEM — Private companies have been waging a "quiet boycott" of Israel in recent months, according to former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres. Speaking to the Russian-language media in Israel, Peres said the boycott appeared to be based primarily in Europe, where businesses no longer believe that Israel wants peace, Israel Radio reported.

WORLD

Cartoon Protested

LONDON — The Israeli Embassy in London sent a letter of protest to The Independent after the newspaper ran a cartoon depicting Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon biting the flesh of a Palestinian baby. In the cartoon, which appeared as Britain marked Holocaust Remembrance Day last week, Sharon says, "What's wrong? Have you never seen a politician kissing a baby?" The embassy harshly criticized the newspaper for reviving the ancient blood libel against Jews. Embassy official Shuli Davidovich said the cartoon was reminiscent of images in the Nazi newspaper Der Sturmer. In a letter to The Independent, she said she was shocked and horrified that the newspaper "failed to draw the line between legitimate criticism and anti-Semitism."

Germany Funds Jews

BERLIN — Germany has signed an accord giving the Central Council of Jews in Germany $3 million (US) in annual funding. The signing of the deal by Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder and Paul Spiegel, head of the CCJG, came on the 58th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz. It establishes the first legal partnership between the Jewish community and the government since World War II and is similar to deals with the Catholic and Lutheran churches.

Saudi Backs Joe

LONDON — A Saudi columnist has welcomed the presidential candidacy of U.S. Senator Joseph Lieberman, saying Lieberman would go out of his way to prove that he is not biased in favour of the Jewish community. As a result, as president, he would offer the Palestinians concessions never offered by his predecessors, columnist Walid Abu Murshid wrote last month in the London-based newspaper Al-Sharq Al-Awsat. The fear that "Jews will be blamed for everything done" by Lieberman as president and the "requirement that the first Jewish president... must prove he places his Americanism ahead of his Jewishness" would serve Palestinian interests, Murshid wrote.

Rubin Lawsuit

LOS ANGELES — The estate of Jewish Defense League leader Irv Rubin has filed a $5 million (US) wrongful death claim against the U.S. government in connection with his apparent suicide at a federal detention centre. The Montreal-born Rubin, 57, was awaiting trial last year on charges of conspiring to bomb a mosque and a congressman's office when he allegedly slashed his throat with a safety razor and then jumped headfirst from a balcony at the jail. He died in hospital nine days later. The FBI declared his death a suicide. But Rubin's widow suggested her husband might have been murdered.

Weaning America

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A new think-tank headed by an Israeli academic last week put forward a plan "to extricate America from the morass of the Middle East" by helping "the U.S. [end] its dependence on oil." The Washington, D.C.-based Institute for the Analysis of Global Security, headed by Gal Luft, proposes powering fuel cells with methanol produced by American clean-coal technologies, which would replace the oil-based combustion engines found in most cars. Luft said unlike pure-hydrogen fuels that are most often being researched to power fuel cells, methanol can be distributed through cheaply retrofitted existing gas stations. "If the plan is fully implemented, we won't have to buy one drop of Middle East oil for use in automotive transportation within the decade," Luft said.

Israel Number 3 For Workaholism: Survey

HAIFA — Israel has the third highest percentage of workaholics, behind only the United States and Japan, a new survey from the University of Haifa has found.

The survey, conducted by the university's Center for the Study of Organizations and Human Resource Management found that 8.1 per cent of Israeli workers could be described as workaholics, compared to 12.7 per cent of U.S. workers and 9.3 per cent of Japanese workers. Belgium, at 6.8 per cent and Holland at 6.5 per cent rank fourth and fifth.

Prof. Itzhak Harpaz, the director of the centre, conducted the Israeli portion of the survey, which interviewed 1,800 private and public sector workers.

He said Israeli workaholics work about 60 hours a week, compared to 45 hours for other workers, and tend to place more importance on work than family.

The survey found that 91 per cent of Israeli workaholics were men, and that married men work longer than single men. It also found that 70 per cent of workaholics are in the private sector, and only 30 per cent in the public sector.

Pipes discusses barriers to peace and free speech

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

In light of the eleventh-hour negotiations that preceded Daniel Pipes' on-again, off-again lecture last week at York University, the pro-Israel academic prefaced his scheduled campus talk on Barriers to Peace in the Middle East with comments about barriers to free speech.

Who's intimidating whom?

Please see page 22

Pipes, who also spoke at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, delivered his lecture at York's Tait Mackenzie athletic building under what he said was the heaviest security he has ever encountered as a speaker, including the presence of both Toronto police and RCMP officers, as well as surveillance cameras. That level of security was deemed necessary by the university, not by Pipes or the organizers, the latter said at a press conference.

Following protests from the university's Middle Eastern Students Association prior to his visit, Pipes' Tuesday afternoon talk was cancelled by the management of York's independently run Student Centre because of security concerns.

York's Jewish Student Federation and its umbrella organization, Hillel of Greater Toronto (formerly Jewish Campus Services) then turned to Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, for assistance, and CJC executive director Bernie Farber contacted York's president Lorna Marsden, who reversed the ban.

After Pipes' talk, pro-Palestinian protesters proceeded to occupy Marsden's office. The protesters particularly object to Pipe's Campus Watch Web site (www.campus-watch.org), which monitors and critiques specific professors and universities on their approach to Mideast studies.

Another soul among the stars

Tragedy, alas, often provides context for things that are frequently unnoticed. Sometimes during grief, friendship and goodness can shine like a light illuminating the path through the long, dark night of sorrow and doubt. What follows is a true story.

* * *

From the editor's desk

Two weeks ago, on Wednesday, Jan. 22, The CJN received a telephone call from George Brady. Brady is a lively, energetic, successful businessman in Toronto who survived the Nazis as a young teenager in Theresienstadt. Many CJN readers, and others far and wide, know him as the older brother of young, beautiful Hana Brady who perished in Auschwitz.

The story of Hana's life, along with that of Fumiko Ishioka, the director of the Japanese Holocaust Museum, and the eerie, remarkable set of circumstances that brought Ishioka and George together, have been told in the award-winning book Hana's Suitcase by Karen Levine.

At the other end of the phone, George's voice was shaking with emotion.

"The front page of the paper."

"Yes, George."

"The drawing by Petr Ginz."

He was referring to the drawing titled Moon Landscape, by Petr Ginz, that had appeared on page 1 of that week's issue of The CJN. Ginz had drawn an image of Earth as he had imagined it would appear as seen from the surface of the moon. He was 14 years old, a prisoner at Theresienstadt, at the time.

The CJN had published a copy of the drawing because Colonel Ilan Ramon had taken it with him on his voyage to outer space.

"Ginz and I were together in Theresienstadt. He was the editor, the driving force behind Vedem." (Vedem was the secret magazine produced each week by a group of 13- to 15-year-old Jewish boys in Theresienstadt. George was part of that group. We Are Children Just The Same, Aventinum, 1995, tells the story of Vedem and the courageous boys who put it together.)

George's voice trailed off. I could hear him catching his breath, regaining his composure.

"How could this be? It cannot be simply a coincidence."

I was thunderstruck by what he had told me. So much of what had happened to George in the past two years had come to him on wings of mystery and improbable chance. Now, again, another coincidence of past with present had taken hold of him. He was shaking.

Our conversation ended with both of us caught in the inexplicability of the sudden intersection of George's life with that of Ramon's.

That night, I related the "coincidence" to a friend, M., who was also George's friend. Indeed he had played the pivotal role in setting in motion the train of events that led, eventually, to the writing of Hana's Suitcase. I also knew that M. and Ramon were close friends. M. and his family had been in Cape Canaveral, Fla., to attend Columbia's launch the week before. George's phone call, I knew, would interest him.

A remarkable individual, M. embraces the important moments of life the way a scholar embraces a favourite text, with reverence and love. He sees with clarity through the haze and distortion of vain testaments. His generosity of soul and material are renowned. No cause, when he embraces it, is too small or too large. And for his friends, no labour is ever lost.

He too was set aback by the coincidence. He wanted Ilan to find out about it. And he knew how he could make it happen.

He and his wife were flying to Florida to be with Ilan's wife, Rona, and her four children during the excitement and stress of the last week of Columbia's orbit.

We arranged for George to call M. in Florida and to relate the story of George's connection to Petr's drawing – and thus, as well, to Ilan—to Rona.

Rona was so moved by the story that she asked George to send her a brief email summarizing its detail so that she could forward it to her husband on the Columbia even before his return home.

Last Thursday, George came to The CJN office, and the following e-mail was sent to Rona to pass on to her husband.

"Dear Col. Ramon: Thank you for helping to preserve Petr Ginz's memory. He was an insightful, sensitive and uniquely talented individual. I always felt it was my responsibility to help keep his memory alive. How grateful I am to you for having memorialized Petr's work, and thus his memory too, as part of your mission.

"Whenever I look up into the sky, I always feel that I have some 'friends' up there. And now I know I do.

"I have worked these past many years to preserve the memories of my sister Hana, and of my friends, like Petr. But it has not been only for them. It has been for the sake of all the children, more than a million, who were killed during that terrible time. When I look up into the night sky and I see the stars lighting up the darkness, I imagine those stars are the million and a half souls shining down at me from heaven.

"How appropriate and wonderful and poetic that you have helped to preserve the memories of those souls while sailing free among those stars on behalf of all humanity.

"Again, thank you.

George Brady."

* * *

Another soul has now been added to the constellation of those millions of stars.

Kolot institute gives voice to pluralism in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although religious pluralism among Jews has taken a back seat to the intifadah in news about Israel over the past two years, Moti Bar-Or, the director of an Israeli initiative aimed at advancing Jewish pluralism, believes that the issue is particularly important now.

"I'm a big believer that Israel needs a more Jewish and more pluralistic state and society and culture," he said in a recent interview during his first trip to Canada. "I see this as a security question, not only a cultural question. I see the dialogue between Jews as the essence of the Israeli state, not less than the Palestinian problem."

Moti Bar-Or

He spent his two-day Toronto visit, en route to San Francisco and New York, teaching and fundraising for Kolot, the Jerusalem-based institute he founded in 1997. Since then its enrolment has risen to tomore than 300 and its budget has tripled to $1.2 million (US).

Kolot – Hebrew for "voices" – is best known for two programs: a lay leadership program involving two years of Jewish text study and a program for Jewish professionals, called Tehuda, which is Hebrew for "resonance."

Among its alumni are Karmi Gilon, Israel's ambassador to Denmark, former MK Dedi Zucker and journalists Bambi Sheleg and Ari Shavit.

Lay leaders are expected to become involved in social activism and tikkun olam projects, while Tehuda alumni are encouraged to infuse Jewish values into their work. Alumni projects include soup kitchens, pluralistic schools, a project addressing issues regarding foreign workers, and another aimed at preventing trafficking of women prostitutes.

Ordinary Israelis are probably most concerned about the intifadah and taxes, admitted Bar-Or. "I think it's a question of leadership, grasping for a fresh leadership... to give us optimism and meaning."

One of Kolot's newest programs, Limits of Power, is a study program designed for high-ranking officers in the Israeli army, air force and intelligence units. "For me, it's one of the highest points of our work," said Bar-Or, who is one of the instructors in the program.

Because of the intifadah, Bar-Or said, there has been a tremendous increase in the number of Israelis searching for meaning. "If you have a mission, it's easier to deal with pain."

Candidates for Kolot programs must be committed to a project of social benefit and only one of five applicants are accepted, noted Bar-Or, an ordained rabbi from a modern Orthodox background who combined yeshiva study in Gush Etzion with army service in Israel's Hesder program.

Neatly, but informally, attired in pants, shirt and sweater, with an unobtrusively patterned grey crocheted kippah on his head, Bar-Or, 42, rejects stereotyping.

In Israel, it's easier to be "regular Orthodox" or "regular secular," he admits. "Your track in life is clear. It's much harder to take the best of the two and create a third way, but it gives me a lot of passion and hope."

"At some point, I understood that modern Orthodox isn't the only solution for Israel," he reflected, adding that Israel "has to produce more Jewish living options beyond the narrow Orthodox or secular [definitions]."

His years at Elul, the pluralistic learning centre he co-founded in 1989, transformed his life, his vision and even his theology, he said. Earlier, he had envisioned himself living in a homogeneous community and didn't see himself reaching out to the secular world.

"I felt there was a need for much broader dialogue."

New rules for cemeteries, funeral businesses

TORONTO — Community officials are studying a recently passed Ontario law that will introduce new regulations for cemeteries and funeral businesses.

Queen's Park says Bill 209, passed during the last session of the legislature, will increase consumer protection in the "bereavement sector," including cemeteries, crematoria, funeral homes and retailers of markers and caskets.

The bill calls mainly for administrative changes to the way cemeteries and funeral parlours conduct business, including broader disclosure in advertising and standardized price lists, increased access to alternative and "no frills" services, and more extensive codes of ethics. They're the first changes in the area in a decade.

Overall, the law will merge the old Cemeteries Act and the Funeral Directors Act, under which the operator of a funeral home was prohibited from owning or operating a cemetery, and vice-versa.

The bill was passed, but the more important regulations are still to be worked out. The Jewish community, through Canadian Jewish Congress, will make its views known.

The government has said it wishes to consult religious communities before enacting the regulations.

The law will regulate companies that sell Jewish monuments, most of which now dot Bathurst Street.

Stephen Speisman, executive director of Pardes Shalom Cemetery, and Michael Benjamin of Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel, both say the real impact on the Jewish community will lie in the law's regulations, which are expected to be worked out by spring.

Woman loses 72 pounds and 8 dress sizes!

Hi, I'm Janice Lerch. For more than 15 years I dreamed of being slim. Then I made an amazing weight loss discovery that helped me melt off 72 lbs. of fat in 12 easy months. My dress size plunged from a hefty 18 to a slender size 10 and it was effortless. If you are suffering from a weight problem, please take a moment to read my amazing story.

BEFORE

Diets Don't Work. For 15 years my immense weight caused me pain and suffering. I avoided going out. I always thought people were snickering behind my back. I hated to shop so I wore the same old clothes.

I tried a multitude of diets, weight loss programs and gimmicks. I attended group meetings faithfully. I'd lose 5 to 10 pounds, get bored, stop going, and gain all my weight back.

I'd dream about being slim, but had no idea how to get there.

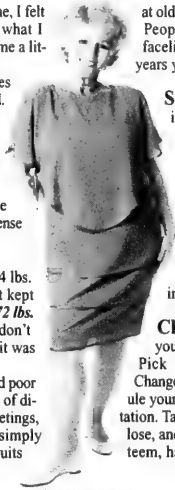
The Miracle. One day I read about Positive Changes Hypnosis in the newspaper. My first step was to attend the Positive Changes free weight loss consultation. It was surprisingly fun and informative. For the first time, I felt that someone understood what I was going through. It gave me a little spark of hope.

I kept waiting for the sales pitch, but it never happened. I was never pressured. Everything was explained in detail and the fee was surprisingly reasonable. I knew that I desperately needed help, and the Positive Changes philosophy made sense to me. I signed up.

Instant Results. I lost 4 lbs. that first week. After that, my weight kept melting away. My total reduction was 72 lbs. and four dress sizes. To be honest, I don't even remember losing my weight — it was that fast and easy.

Hypnosis eliminated my cravings and poor eating habits. I'm free from the hassle of dieting forever! I don't have to go to meetings, count calories, or weigh my food. I simply enjoy healthy, flavourful foods like fruits and vegetables, and drink lots of water. It's been as if my mind is on auto pilot.

Life Is Wonderful! When I look at old pictures, I can't believe that was me. People tell me I look like I've had a facelift. My husband says I seem twenty years younger.



AFTER

Saved My Life. The truth is, Positive Changes saved my life. If it weren't for this program, I'd probably be over 200 pounds and miserable. That's the reason I'm sharing my story, and the reason I'm recommending Positive Changes to you.

I know that you're skeptical. I was, too. But my skepticism vanished when my weight started melting off.

Change Your Life Today! So set your skepticism aside. Stop hesitating. Pick up the phone and call Positive Changes Hypnosis right now. Ask to schedule your complimentary weight loss consultation. Take it from me: you have nothing to lose, and a whole lot to gain — like self-esteem, happiness, peace of mind, and freedom from your weight. Call now. It'll be the best decision you ever made.

Israeli pianist draws standing ovation in downtown concert

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Young Israeli pianist Shai Wosner, who has received rave reviews from critics and internationally renowned musicians, performed recently at the Sandra Ainsley Gallery in the Exchange Tower in Toronto.

The standing-room-only concert was presented by the Koffler School of Music and The Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

Wosner, 26, displayed his brilliance in a program that included Mozart's Sonata in C major, K. 330, Chopin's Fantasy in F minor, op. 49, and Variation and Fugue on a Theme of Handel by Brahms.

The standing ovation and calls for encores brought Wosner back with an encore by Schuman.

He studied for 12 years with Emanuel Krasovsky of the Rubin Music Academy at Tel Aviv University. And during his time at the Julliard School of Music in New York, he was the only student of renowned pianist Emanuel Ax.

"[Wosner] plays everything better than I do." Ax once told the Jerusalem Post. "So it's not the case of me telling him what to do or how to do it. Rather, we talk about music and, believe me, I learn as much as he does."

Wosner has won numerous international competitions, including the 1999 Queen Elizabeth Competition in Brussels, and he was cited for the best performance of a Beethoven sonata at the 8th Arthur Rubinstein International Piano Master Competition in 1995.

Wosner also participated in Daniel Barenboim's workshop for young artists in Weimar, Germany, in 1999, where he performed with acclaimed cellist Yo Yo Ma. Barenboim, who was the director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, invited Wosner to perform as a soloist.

Barenboim has described Wosner as "a very serious and profound musician," and said that he holds Wosner in the highest regard.

Wosner's parents are Holocaust survivors. His mother, who lives in Tel Aviv, is also a violinist. During the war, she was saved by righteous gentiles in Slovakia. Wosner's late father was a survivor of Auschwitz.

Wosner's wife is a doctor in the Israeli Defence Forces. Wosner, whose home base is Tel Aviv, has also served in the IDF, and over the past few years, he has performed in concerts throughout the world.

Shai Wosner and Adrienne Cohen, diector of the Koffler School of Music.

As vibrant as Wosner is in performance, in person he is modest and unassuming.

He told The CJN that when he was a child in Tel Aviv, "we had a piano and when I was seven years old, I was attracted to the piano and began playing by ear."

He says he played the music he heard on the radio, but when his parents offered to give him lessons, he was reluctant "until they told me that I would be able to play more things. I was drawn into it."

He says he performs mostly in concert halls but he said he enjoyed performing in the more intimate Sandra Ainsley Gallery. "The Sandra Ainsley Gallery is very beautiful. The atmosphere was special and you don't often get to perform in such an atmosphere that is so friendly."

Currently, he is preparing for several concerts in Europe, Israel and New York. He says that although his Toronto concert featured classical composers, "some composers speak to me more than others, and I play some relatively modern composers like the Hungarian composer [Gyorgy] Ligeti."

Eli Rubenstein, national director of The March of the Living, which often brings Israeli artists and cultural groups to Canada, said he "first suggested that Shai come to perform in Canada after [seeing] a video of his live performance which appeared on Belgium television and when I read the glowing reviews in newspapers all around the world."

Adrienne Cohen, director of the Koffler School of Music, said Wosner's concert was "one of the most memorable we have had in our salon series. It was exciting for us to feature a young and highly talented performer [such] as Shai. He has an amazing and promising career ahead of him."

She added that her phone has been "ringing off the hook with praises and compliments. The evening has been described as elegant, exciting and magical."

'Reach hope and belief in the future'

In merely 16 minutes, less than the time it might take to write a note of farewell, an entire universe was brought to disaster. Indeed, seven entire universes were brought to disaster Saturday morning when the shuttle Columbia disintegrated in the sky over Texas in the narrow band of thin air that separates earth's atmosphere from outer space. All seven crew members died. They were only 16 minutes away from a safe landing. But that seemingly small gap of time was never closed. And for their loved ones awaiting the astronauts' safe return to earth, alas, that small gap became eternity.

We mourn for the astronauts and their families. How full of confidence and optimism they were as they waved to the support staff and to the cameras as they jauntily walked to their launch positions on Jan. 16. Their sense of purpose and commitment to each other was apparent for all to see in the broad, excited smiles on their faces. Their deaths have hit us all very hard. One of the deaths, however – that of Ilan Ramon – hits us even harder.

Ramon was the first Israeli to fly into outer space. Much has been written of his heralded career as a fighter pilot. His exploits, though mostly unpublicized, were nevertheless known for their high importance, even as he was known for his superior skill and his calm courage.

But it was more than his career that distinguished Ilan Ramon as a human being. It was his character, his humility despite heroism, and his deep understanding of who he was and where he stood in the long line of Jewish history.

Ramon made certain the entire world knew that he took his place among the crew of the shuttle Columbia as an Israeli and as a Jew. "Being the first Israeli astronaut," he said modestly, "I feel I am representing all Jews and all Israelis. I am… proof that even with all of the hard times, we can go on."

Last week, as the Columbia quietly orbited the earth, Ramon spoke to us from hundreds of thousands of kilometres high above. Pointing to the small sefer Torah he had taken with him into the heavens, he said, in a fateful foreshadowing that none us knew then would soon have to serve us as a source of strength, "This represents, more than anything, the ability of the Jewish people to survive, despite everything, from horrible periods, black days, to reach… hope and belief in the future."

How black a day it was when those 16 minutes failed to close. And yet, as Ilan himself urged from on high, we must and we will, because of him and others like him, reach for our hope and belief in the future.

Philo, the sage and scholar of ancient Alexandria, wrote that "God bent the eyes of all other creatures downward… but the eyes of man, He set high, that he might behold heaven."

How blessed Ilan Ramon was that he could set his eyes so high, so close to heaven. How blessed we were that we could say we set our eyes upon Ilan Ramon. May his memory and the memory of the crew of the shuttle Columbia be for blessing.

Redefine community integration

The article on Toronto's Russian Jews served to emphasize the separation between Russian and Canadian Jews ("Russian Jews in Toronto: a separate solitude?" CJN, Jan. 9). However, if the Toronto Jewish community is to stand united, newcomers and immigrants must be welcomed at all levels.

The article's statement that Russian Jews are not used to giving charity is particularly frustrating. In fact, they are often mistrustful of funding organizations, but are known for kindness and generosity toward friends. During last year's appeal for emergency funds for Israel, friends and clients of JIAS, many in dire need, raised $10,000 in a very short time with minimum solicitation. As well, the Jewish Russian Community Centre's $4 million budget is due in large part to the Russian Jewish community's generosity. The UJA Federation would achieve better results in its fundraising initiatives if it were to invest itself and community members in truly welcoming newcomers.

Jews from the former Soviet Union make up almost 25 per cent of Toronto's Jewish community. Their absence from leadership positions promotes marginalization. More than a token few need to be included in key positions in order to increase the group's sense of belonging and thus strengthen the community. The arrival of new community members must be celebrated.

We need to redefine integration to include strategies for bonding and community building. We must stop stereotyping ourselves, immigrants and locals alike, as being more or less aggressive and ambitious or more or less proud. We must remember that our humanity and our collective history bind us, while our differences are superficial. Established Jewish Canadians need to adapt to the changes that are inevitable in open, growing communities. Newcomers must be valued. We must think outside the box while living in one home.

CBC must report, not make, news

The CBC should look again at the show on foreign correspondents that it aired several months ago. I don't remember the show's exact date, and sadly, I did not tape it, because I did not realize its significance beforehand. But the network should watch the segment by reporter Neil Macdonald at a Palestinian hospital, instructing a Palestinian sitting on a bench as to what demeanor will invoke the greatest degree of sympathy from the viewing public. They should watch after that as Macdonald's lips almost curl with utter contempt, if not outright disdain (I really don't want to say hatred), as he speaks of the Israeli military. Then they should tell me that Macdonald is not manipulating the news and that this is an unbiased reporter only doing his job! A reporter's job is to report, not make, the news.

I would love to know what the reactions of Robert Rabinovitch, CBC's president, and Joe Schlesinger, the co-host of CBC Newsworld's Foreign Assignment, is to these shenanigans.

When is minority significant?

After thousands died horrific deaths at the hands of Islamic terrorists in the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington, D.C., it was thought that nothing could surpass such wanton killings. Unfortunately, the number of suicide bombings and other deliberate murders of innocents in 2002 came tragically close. We witnessed hundreds killed or maimed in Israel, Bali, Russia, Kenya and Yemen, all at the hands of Islamic terrorists.

Each incident was followed by condemnation and even disgust from political and religious world leaders. Muslim clerics described the terrorist groups as either fringe elements or made up of frustrated and misguided Arabs who represented only a small minority of Muslims throughout the world. But as the number of these atrocities mount, is it not a fair question to ask when does a minority become a significant percentage? The perpetrators may be relatively small in number, but they are supported by many governments, in such countries as Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Iran, Sudan, Libya, Lebanon and Yemen, and in the Palestinian Authority. Just as Canadian members of Parliament represent us, so do these killings represent the countries that fund and harbour them. U.S. President George W. Bush is right when he states either they are with us in the fight against terrorism or against us. The evidence as to where they stand is overwhelmingly self-evident.

Don't make Pipes a martyr

As someone strongly opposed to Daniel Pipes, the director of the Middle East Forum, I was disappointed that many organizations decided to overreact to his presence. But I chose not to attend the anti-Pipes rally when I found out that a "diversity of tactics" would be used. We on the social-democratic left cannot argue with Pipes if we turn him into a martyr for free speech.

As a civil libertarian, I defend Pipes' right to free speech. Pipes, on the other hand, is the mastermind behind Campus Watch, an organization that basically seeks to "expose" left-wing and allegedly "pro-Arab" scholars. The site asks students to "inform" on their professors, and even offers a syllabus watch. After the site was introduced, some Arab-American professors became victims of identity theft and e-mail bombing, since Pipes had the audacity to list their private e-mail addresses.

This sort of thing is absolutely wrong in principle, and just because some people with strange ideas about Israel march against Pipes does not mean he deserves support from our community. One should reflect on how the Jewish community would react to an Arab professor who decided to start an organization that asked students to "inform" on Zionist or pro-Israel professors. What is bad for the goose is bad for the gander.

Election 2001: new faces confront old problems

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Almost one third of the seats in the new Knesset scheduled – scheduled to convene on Feb. 17 – will be filled by members who did not serve in the last one.

The 39 new MKs will include 18 from Likud, nine from Shinui and four from Labor.

Other parties presenting new MKs include Balad (two), One Nation (two), the National Religious Party (two), Shas (one), National Union (one) and United Torah Judaism (one). The new batch of MKs includes several with previous Knesset experience who were not members of the 15th Knesset. (for example, Likud's Ehud Olmert and One Nation's Addisu Messele).

The new Knesset will include 18 women, one more than in the outgoing Knesset. The Likud will have seven female MKs, followed by Labor (four), Shinui (three), NRP (one), Meretz (one), Yisrael b'Aliyah (one) and One Nation (one).

Twenty-seven of the new MKs are observant Jews, the majority of them coming from Shas, UTJ and the NRP.

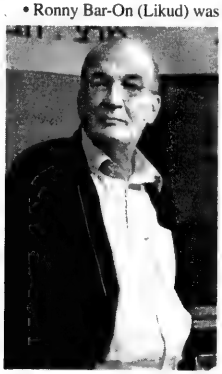
Nine of the new members of the 16th Knesset are new immigrants from the former Soviet Union, and there are nine new MKs who live in the disputed territories.

The 16th Knesset will also feature its first father-son team – Likud's Ariel and Omri Sharon – as well as two siblings, Labor's Danny Yatom and Likud's Ehud Yatom.

Some of the new MKs have already made headlines in the past:

• Ronny Bar-On (Likud) was chosen in 1997 to be attorney general, but resigned 24 hours later following harsh criticism over his nomination;



Meretz leader Yossi Sarid resigned as party leader, but kept his seat, after his party's poor showing.

• Gideon Sa'ar (Likud) was cabinet secretary up until a few months ago.

• Isaac Herzog (Labor) is the son of former president Chaim Herzog and was cabinet secretary in the government of former prime minister Ehud Barak.

• Rabbi Yisrael Eichler (United Torah Judaism) was a regular panelist on Channel One's Popolitika, where he crossed swords with fellow panelist and pundit Yosef "Tommy" Lapid (before Lapid left the show to assume the leadership of Shinui).

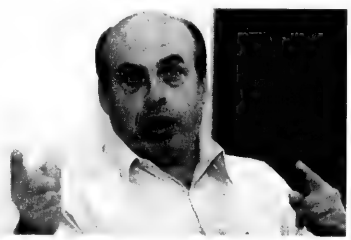
Voter turnout for last week's election was the lowest in the history of the State of Israel. Only 69 per cent of Israel's eligible voters cast ballots, according to a survey conducted by the Central Election Committee (CEC).

This compares to a 79 per cent turnout in both 1999 and 1996.

The highest voter turnout for a Knesset election was recorded in 1988, with 80 per cent of eligible voters participating. The previous low, before last week, was the 75 per cent turnout in the vote for the second Knesset in 1951. (Turnout was even lower in 2001, when only 62 per cent of eligible citizens voted in the special election for prime minister.)

Prof. Abraham Diskin, who conducted the survey for the CEC, explained the low turnout by saying that "the public is fed up with politicians."

On the other hand, voter turnout was particularly high among haredim and residents of Jewish communities in the disputed territories.



Natan Sharansky resigned from Knesset, but not as leader of Yisrael b'Aliyah, after his party dropped from six to two seats in last week's vote.
[RNS, Isranet and Israel Sun photos]

Jerusalem had the highest voter turnout of Israel's major cities, while Tel Aviv had the lowest.

There will be fewer parties in the 16th Knesset than in the previous one. Altogether, 13 parties passed the 1.5 per cent threshold and won seats, compared to the 15 parties that made up the previous parliament.

Among those not making the cut was the right-wing Herut, headed by Michael Kleiner, who sat as his party's only MK in the previous Knesset. Also shut out was Yisrael Acheret, which focused on issues of concern to mainstream Israeli youth.

'Israel needs unity': Sharon

Excerpts from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's speech to the nation on election night.

"My friends, those who are seated on the dais and those who are in the hall, I want first of all to say thank you to all of those who aided me and stood beside me in this battle.

"Thanks to the voters, who believed in my path, the path of the Likud. Thanks to all of Israel's citizens, who came to vote today and to determine how the country will act in the coming years. To everyone, thank you, thank you...

"It is time to come together. I am announcing today, that after the president assigns me the task of forming a government, I will ask all Zionist parties to join a unity government that will be as broad as possible.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon

"I say to all the parties, the differences between us diminish in the face of the murderous hatred of the terrorist organizations of anything Israeli and Jewish, the threat of the war in the Gulf and attacks on Israel and the economic crisis that is ripping Israeli society apart...

"Today is not the time for celebrations – no celebrations. This is a time for soul-searching, for coming together in unity, for fusing all forces in order to bring about a genuine victory. Victory over terrorism, and the beginning of a true peace process. Victory over unemployment and renewal of economic growth. Then and only then will we celebrate the triumph of the Israeli people.

"Exactly three months ago, the national unity government was dismantled and the country was dragged into an unnecessary election campaign...

"Israel needs unity. Israel needs stability. Israel needs both quickly before the crisis deepens.

Quoting at length from an appeal for unity by the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, Sharon said: "We will act together, as one person, with one heart, without ruling out anyone..."

Sharon continued: "The eyes of the people, of the world, are upon us. Everyone is waiting to see if Israel will act together, united, in order to achieve its aims: security, prosperity, quiet, and peace. This is possible. It depends only on us, and with the Lord's help, it will come about. Then and only then, the time for celebrations will arrive."

Ground Zero and the Jews

The debate was inevitable. Now that recovery efforts have concluded, it is time to decide what to do with Ground Zero. The Port Authority, the owner of the World Trade Center, and Westfield America, which holds the rights to retail space on the site, want to rebuild the 11 million square feet of office space lost in the buildings' collapse. On the other hand, groups representing the victims feel Ground Zero must become a memorial to those who died in the attacks.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

This debate, frankly, begs for a Jewish perspective.

If the Jewish people have special expertise, it is in the area of destruction and rebuilding. Over centuries of adversity, we have learned how to mourn and memorialize, as well as how to rebuild and thrive.

Rebuilding is an enduring Jewish tradition. After the destruction of the First Temple, Ezekiel dreams of its rebuilding. The Second Temple is destroyed, and Rabbi Yochanan Ben Zakkai begins the reconstruction in Yavneh. Our community exists today because generations of Jews forgot their defeats and disappointments and started over.

Judaism also takes mourning extremely seriously. It mandates mourning rituals such as shivah following the death of a relative and yarhzeit each year on the anniversary of death. On a national level, we observe fasts on days of national catastrophe that occurred 2,500 years ago. Mourning is a sign of respect and expresses that something unique has been lost.

As important as mourning is, rebuilding takes precedence. Mourning reflects our distress with an imperfect world, the pain of seeing a good person perish, the anguish of witnessing a young person die. Mourning protests against the seeming unfairness of it all. Rebuilding goes a step further; if God left us an imperfect world, we must complete it and perfect it. Despite all obstacles, we must survive, and thrive, because we have a world to redeem.

The Partisan's Song contains the line "mir zaynen do," meaning "we are here." After the Holocaust, many survivors lived by this motto, rebuilding their shattered lives, insisting that despite what they had experienced, they were here to stay. In 55 years of wars and aggression, Israelis have also lived by this motto, never giving up, determined to keep thriving in a once desolate land.

Now it's New York's turn.

There must be a memorial; mourning is an obligation. But rebuilding is more important. Currently, the most popular plan for Ground Zero is a proposal to build the world's tallest building on the site. This indeed is the best plan. It affirms that despite this tragic and evil attack, New York defiantly refuses to surrender. This plan insists on rebuilding on a grand scale, and eloquently declares: "mir zaynen do."

Unity government: Labor's impossible choice

By the time this column goes to print, intense coalition negotiations will be underway in Israel. Attention will likely focus on the political implications of a narrow, right-wing government compared to a broad unity government. However, the economic implications of this choice are no less serious.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Each of the two options will have different repercussions for Israel's economic stability, international confidence and, ultimately, the results of the next round of elections. While Labor leader Amram Mitzna prefers to stay out of a unity government in order to sharpen his differences with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's policies on the Palestinians, Sharon and the market prefer a unity government. In this case, at least on the surface, political and economic interests collide.

The unity government collapsed last fall when Labor withdrew over its disagreement with continued preferential treatment for Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. These advantages were preserved in a budget that otherwise slashed essential social services to the weaker groups in Israeli society.

Labor expected that the socio-economic issue would be their winning card in the election, but this did not happen. The party long ago ceased to be a voice for the weak and disadvantaged. Like most Israeli parties, its policies are market-oriented and bear little resemblance to the socialism of its founding generation. Perhaps this is why more than 50 per cent of Israelis objected to holding early elections. They saw Labor's commitment to the social agenda as opportunistic, especially since during the campaign, Mitzna's predecessor Binyamin Ben-Eliezer and several senior colleagues said they prefer to renegotiate a similar arrangement with Sharon for a broad government.

If a narrow government is formed with nationalist and religious parties, it will not be able to undertake the additional draconian economic measures required to deal with unprecedented unemployment of more than 10 per cent and an eight-to-nine per cent drop in GDP over two years. A right-wing government will cut neither incentives to settlements nor huge state subsidies to ultra-Orthodox yeshiva students and institutions – which are dependent on state support for their wherewithal. In this more-of-the-same scenario, international confidence in the Israeli economy will decline unless the United States provides further guarantees for Israel's debt.

A unity government that includes Labor and other sectoral representatives would allow for another, across-the-board slash of direct programs and services in the budget, replaced by massive investment in education and infrastructure. Such a re-orientation of the budget will increase international confidence and will enable the government to raise investment capital abroad. The business sector and the majority of Israelis prefer this option. In fact, more Israelis rank the economic issue, rather than the Palestinian issue, as the top priority for the new government.

Labor's leader links the political and social agendas. Mitzna has repeatedly said that without a breakthrough on the Palestinian issue, the economy cannot rebound. He would rather see Sharon leading a narrow, right-wing government that will fall sooner rather than later, in spite of the short-term economic pain.

Mitzna believes that a second, Sharon-led unity government will not deal with the Palestinian issue any more effectively than its predecessor. There, Labor was not able to seriously influence the agenda politically or economically and simply prolonged a damaging status quo. If Mitzna changes his mind, he will do so only because of internal pressure within the party and the danger of a split that may herald the end of the Labor party as it exists today.

History shows that a unity government is the best way to stabilize economic crises. In 1985, the Shimon Peres-Yitzchak Shamir government succeeded in taming hyper-inflation by negotiating a cross-sectoral wage and price agreement that would have been impossible with either Labor or Likud in opposition.

And therein lies the rub: A narrow right-wing government would allow Labor to be an opposition voice, but it would have serious, negative implications for Israel's international political and economic standing and would likely last no more than a year. A unity government might provide economic relief, but it would not break the Gordian knot linking the economy to the Palestinian issue, and it may well hasten Labor's demise.

The public is cynical either way: more than 60 per cent of Israelis believe that any new government will not last more than two years.

The census: from identity to Mideast politics

It is relatively easy to look at the data on ethnic origin from the 2001 Canadian census, but hard to figure out what they mean. The numbers for religion will be released in a few months and will help give a more accurate picture regarding Jews in Canada. But some patterns can be noted.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Overall, the number of Canadians who claimed a Jewish ethnic origin – alone or in combination with another origin – dropped slightly from roughly 352,000 in 1996 to just under 349,000. Given that Canada's total population has grown over the past five years, this means that the Jewish share of the country's population has also declined slightly.

The numbers in Quebec are down dramatically, by roughly 10,000 since 1996. Perhaps some respondents have chosen to select another ethnicity, such as "Canadian," while citing "Jewish" as their religion. There has likely been continuing outmigration from Quebec as well, particularly among college graduates.

Another factor is the echo effect of the earlier years of the exodus. The Quebec community is elderly, and deaths are not being matched by births in the province. Ex-Montrealers are having their children elsewhere. Jewish immigration to Quebec continues, but perhaps not in sufficient numbers to compensate for the demographic loss.

The ethnic origin question casts a wide net. It is not a question about identity, but about ancestry. In general, it would be wrong to use data for an ethnic origin question to describe the size of a particular "community," though this is often done by community leaders. For example, there are 1.3 million Canadians who list Italian as an ethnic origin. Some of these people may have one Italian origin grandparent, but have few cultural or social ties to the associations and activities of the Italian community.

A fair number of the ethnic Jews counted by the census are likely not very Jewish in a religious or communal sense. Close to half claim a mixed or hyphenated Jewish ancestry. For some, this may be the result of a process of assimilation, the result of a strong identification with another ethnic origin while still considering themselves Jews by religion, or the result of being born into a mixed marriage.

What is also clear is that the changing demography of Canada will pose political challenges to the community. Visible minorities now make up 13.4 per cent of the population, up from 9.4 per cent in 1991. In one sense, these groups are natural allies with Jews in the struggle against discrimination and for social justice. But at the same time, many do not share the common European experiences relating to the Holocaust or the struggles against fascism and communism.

On matters relating to Israel, and to the Middle East more broadly, this divide looms large. In much of the world, Israel is now seen as a colonizer and an aggressor, the Palestinians as desperate victims. One suspects – I have no proof – that Canadian Jews who support Israel are on average more likely to give the Americans the benefit of the doubt regarding a possible war against Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

The census counts 348,000 Canadians who listed "Arab" as one of their ethnic origins. (This number includes 144,000 Lebanese, many of whom happen to be Christian.) This figure does not include a number of "West Asian" Canadians who are not Arab, but who are Muslim – Afghanis, Iranians and Turks – and who number in the tens of thousands. And of course, it does not include Muslims from countries outside the Mideast.

Jewish and Arab/Muslim communities outside their homelands can play one of several roles in the unfolding Israeli-Palestinian conflict. At one extreme, they can echo hardline Israeli and Palestinian positions as loyal defenders of the dug-in views of their homeland leadership. In this way, they would bring to the conflict a zero-sum approach, as they went about their various lobbying and information activities.

The other extreme might be Utopian. These communities may try to act as a force for pluralism, tolerance and moderation, and, eventually, compromise and peace-making. The spectrum of opinion within the Arab diaspora on the Israel issue seems particularly narrow, reflecting the weakness of moderation generally in the Arab world. There still is no Arab equivalent to Peace Now. But it has also been noted that debate on the "situation" is more vigorous within Israel than within the organized Jewish community in the diaspora.

One can only hope that the Canadian environment may help both communities find common ground, and a more constructive environment for the peace process, which must inevitably resume.

Sharon wins despite the abysmal situation

By the norms of Israeli politics, Ariel Sharon, who coasted to victory in last week's general election by winning 38 Knesset seats, should have been soundly defeated by Amram Mitzna.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

As he barnstormed the country for a second term, Sharon laboured under severe disadvantages that could have theoretically doomed his candidacy: the blight of Palestinian terrorism, the drastic downturn in the economy and the sleazy, last-minute scandals that prompted pundits to predict that he would be lucky to capture 30 parliamentary seats.

Instead, Sharon turned the tables and became the first Israeli prime minister since Menachem Begin to win two consecutive elections, virtually doubling Likud's representation in the Knesset and shattering the once-dominant Labor party.

Not bad for a politician who was relegated to pariah status after being forced to resign as defence minister following the ill-fated 1982 war in Lebanon and then dismissed as a has-been whose time had come and gone.

A 74-year-old former general and Yom Kippur War hero, Sharon humbled Ehud Barak in the 2001 election that was Sharon's to lose. The reasons were clear. The Palestinian uprising, having erupted shortly after the collapse of the Camp David summit in July 2000, was taking on a life of its own, and the Oslo peace process, a beam of light in a dark landscape, was fast unravelling.

An ardent opponent of Oslo and a champion of Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, Sharon beat Barak – the most decorated soldier in Israeli history and a former general himself – by convincing Israelis that he would give them what they so yearned for: peace and security.

As everyone knows, Sharon has not kept his promise, the keystone of his electoral campaign. Perhaps no one else in his shoes could have done better. The point is that Sharon has fallen far short of his pledge, at a time when Israel is embroiled in a low-grade war of attrition with the Palestinians that has left Israel extremely vulnerable to terrorist attacks and killed more than 700 Israelis, and when there seems to be no light at the end of the tunnel.

Partly as a result of the current intifadah, the second since 1987, Israel's economy is in a recession, and is reeling. The gross domestic product has shrunk for the second year in a row, the value of the shekel has shrunk, foreign investment is significantly down and the unemployment rate has reached almost 11 per cent, a catastrophic statistic in a nation that had become accustomed to a boom during the highwater mark of the Oslo process. Not since the mitun (recession) of the early 1950s has the economy performed so poorly.

Apart from having to deal with the continuing outbreaks of terrorism and the economic slowdown, Sharon had to cope with two mushrooming scandals that risked capsizing him.

They turned on allegations, currently being investigated, of vote-buying in the Likud primary and of concealment of an illegal foreign loan used by Sharon and his two sons to pay back an illegal foreign donation made during the 2001 election. Indignantly, Sharon denied any wrongdoing.

Given all these handicaps – the mounting human toll of the intifadah, the abysmal state of the economy and the ugly and embarrassing scandals of impropriety – why was Sharon able to score such a relatively impressive triumph at the polls?

The question is all the more relevant considering the fact that, as a succession of polls indicate, the majority of Israelis back policies consistently espoused by the left and at odds with Sharon's positions: the withdrawal from the territories, the removal of Jewish settlements, the end of Israel's occupation there and the establishment of a viable, contiguous Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza.

Although Sharon has patently failed to bring Israel peace and security, a plurality of Israelis essentially trust his muscular and military approach to the worsening conflict with the Palestinians.

In short, they agree with Sharon's edict that no substantive talks should be held unless all Palestinian violence is halted, armed militias – particularly Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade – are disarmed and illegal weapons are collected, Palestinian Authority (PA) President Yasser Arafat is sidelined as an interlocutor, and basic, far-reaching reforms are implemented by the PA.

Many Israelis no longer believe that Arafat, who cannot and/or will not rein in terrorism, is a sincere and trustworthy partner. Sharon has exploited this perception to the hilt by refusing to negotiate with Arafat, by demonizing him and his associates at every opportunity and by placing him under virtual house arrest in his compound in Ramallah.

Having lost family members, relatives and friends to suicide bombers and having grown disillusioned with the Palestinian leadership, most Israelis have thrown in their lot behind Sharon's policy of imposing "a psychology of defeat" on the Palestinians.

Last March, about a week before the Israeli army stormed into the West Bank in Operation Defensive Shield, the first of two massive incursions designed to disable the Palestinian infrastructure of terrorism, Sharon spelled out his strategy. "The aim," he said, "is to increase the number of losses (on the Palestinians). Only after they've been battered will we be able to conduct talks."

To some degree, Sharon's policy has been successful. By reoccupying the Palestinian autonomous areas in the West Bank, Israel has reduced the pace of suicide bombings. Yet Israel has paid a heavy price. The Palestinians are further embittered. The gulf between Israel and the Palestinians is growing. The prospect of meaningful negotiations has all but evaporated, at least for now.

Yet paradoxically enough, Sharon – a portly figure who markets himself as an avuncular uncle – has not been blamed for the terrorism that still torments Israel. Previous prime ministers, from Shimon Peres to Barak, were politically harmed by suicide bombings. Benjamin Netanyahu trounced Peres in the 1996 election after a spate of such attacks. Barak fell victim to the same pattern. With his most recent victory, Sharon broke that mould.

In addition, Sharon benefited from the widespread view that he possesses infinitely more experience on the national scene than Mitzna – the former mayor of Haifa – and is better equipped to handle the Palestinian crisis and the looming war in Iraq.

Similarly, Sharon gained votes from the comparatively low turnout – 68 per cent, compared to 79 per cent in 1999, when Barak ousted Netanyahu. This time around, some Israelis stayed away out of despair over the situation. Still others, such as Israeli Arabs, who comprise an important but disaffected bloc, boycotted the election in droves, much to Mitzna's detriment.

Ariel Sharon basks in his electoral victory.

Sharon was doubtlessly helped by the astounding success of Tommy Lapid's anti-clerical Shinui party. He was also assisted by defectors from the Labor party, who believed that its leadership, led by Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, had diluted and compromised its policies in Sharon's first national unity government.

Finally, the demise of the Labor party – which at the height of its influence in 1969 could boast of 56 seats and must now be content with merely 19 – stemmed from its inability to make inroads into the Russian and Sephardi communities.

And so Sharon won a remarkable victory.

Hebrew Public Speaking

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

Anyone who has ever tried to master a second language can attest to the fact that public speaking demands a high level of fluency. All of our Middle School students participate annually in a Hebrew public speaking contest. Students are provided with topics and guidance from their class teacher, and class winners move on to the grade finals, with three winners chosen from each grade. The judging panel includes teachers, principals, and outside guests. "The children's command of modern, spoken Hebrew is incredible," says Rabbi Pinchas Brumer, Middle School Principal.

Anti-Semitism examined at CHAT panel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Although we are currently experiencing virulent anti-Semitism in Europe and around the world, we cannot compare today's situation to 1933, says Len Rudner, director of community relations, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

"Unlike in 1933, we have a police force that is attuned to the needs of our community, and we live in a country with legislation that police use to ensure our communal rights.

"These are fundamental ways we are much better off than 60 years ago," Rudner said at the first in a series of parent education talks sponsored by CHAT Richmond Hill.

The CJC panel, which was moderated by Bernie Farber, executive director CJC, Ontario region, also included Simon Rosenblum, director of public policy and Israel affairs, CJC, Ontario region; and Ed Morgan, chair, CJC, Ontario region.

Rudner said the blueprint for classic anti-Semitism has not changed: "There are [still] too many Jews; they have too much power and will get stronger; and they cannot be trusted."

But, he said, we can consider ourselves fortunate that of the 200 anti-Semitic incidents reported in Canada since September 2000, which included graffiti, phone calls and letters, only three involved assault against an individual.

Yet we must keep in mind that anti-Semitism is still an issue, he said. "It is not our parents' anti-Semitism, though. We see it as a new incarnation. It is the oldest hatred, but it is one that wears many hats on its many heads."

Rosenblum said we must be prepared to deal with anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism. "The order of the day is that we [must confront] biases head on with facts. We don't need to be defensive and let the argument be out there without a significant challenge."

He said, "Our job is to fight back and deal with it aggressively."

Not all criticism of Israel is illegitimate, Rosenblum said, but there "is a lot of ultra-criticism."

For example, he said, the belief that the largely inadvertent killing of Palestinians and the targeting of Israeli citizens to suicide bombings are morally and ethically equal is offensive.

Morgan said universities need to protect students against hate mongering by professors.

"Hate crimes are hard to prove, but that is not the rule that should prevail on campuses.

"A professor cannot be put in jail for being a racist, but he can be fired. It is a huge problem because universities hide behind hate crime legislation."

On the other hand, Morgan said, universities should not be banning speakers such as Daniel Pipes, Mideast scholar and director of the Middle East Forum, simply because people do not agree with them. "That is mainstream politics that gets mislabelled."

The aggregate affect of anti-Semitic incidents is brutal on students, said Morgan. "The hardest problem to deal with is that of the tainted atmosphere, and universities have not yet been made to deal with this."

Students must be ready to deal with problems, Morgan said. "We can't say things are disastrous, but we have to be vigilant because the bad is creeping up."

With regard to the attempts by students and faculty to block last week's speech by Pipes at York University, Farber said it is an ongoing effort by pro-Palestinians to ensure that pro-Israeli dialogue is not brought forward.

He said it was a significant victory for academic freedom that the Pipes speech went ahead.

"If we cannot talk on campus, then where are we as a society?"

HOLOCAUST WALL OF REMEMBRANCE

To immortalize the precious souls who were murdered in the Holocaust, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem has built the Wall of Remembrance at Earl Bales Park in Toronto.

This Memorial, which also includes the history of the Holocaust, serves as a permanent symbol for our children and future generations that the lessons of the past must not be forgotten.

Members of the Jewish Community are urged to provide names of loved ones to be carved on the eight black granite walls surrounding the Holocaust Monument. Survivors of the Holocaust, who have since passed away, are memorialized on the Wall in a separate section.

Bush address turns Israeli vote into a sideshow

Nothing in the news can compete with war or the threat of war.

The day of the Israeli elections last week happened to coincide with the date of U.S. President George W. Bush's state of the union address. All eyes were focused on Bush in anticipation of what he would say about U.S. intentions toward Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein. And all this occurred against the backdrop of action at the United Nations, reports about UN inspection teams in Iraq, and international reaction, especially from UN Security Council members Great Britain and Russia.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

To pick up the National Post the next morning, Jan. 29, and find a report on the Israeli elections on page 2 said it all.

The previous night, CBC's and CTV's national broadcasts were virtual mirrors of each other: the first four items dealt in almost identical order with Bush's state of the union address, reactions from Washington, D.C., and Iraq, and the debate over Iraq in the Canadian Parliament. Neil Macdonald's report on the Israeli elections was item number 5 on CBC's lineup and Joy Malbon's report for CTV was number 6, even following a report of renewed U.S. fighting in Afghanistan.

The exercise of news judgment – the choice of stories and their emphasis and placement – is always an interesting phenomenon to observe for what it reveals about the relative importance assigned to certain events.

Not that the Israeli elections were ignored. The results had been long anticipated by election polls – Likud was expected to rise dramatically, Labor to fall precipitously and Shinui to emerge as the new anti-clerical wild-card party.

Journalists immediately started to inquire about the meaning of the outcome. CTV anchor Lloyd Robertson asked Malbon about the effect of a possible war with Iraq on Israel. There were also questions about the shape of a narrow right-wing coalition compared to a broad-based national unity government involving Labor, which is what the vast majority of Israelis want.

Alison Smith on Newsworld explored these issues in an early-morning interview on Jan. 29 with Gerald Steinberg, head of Bar-Ilan University's conflict resolution program, and Jonathan Kuttab, a Palestinian human rights lawyer. Steinberg rejected Kuttab's argument that Israel's "occupation and settlements" (whether supported by a narrow or broad-based Israeli government) are at the core of the failure to advance peace with the Palestinians.

Steinberg summed up Israel's predicament in these terms: "One of the big problems and the real disappointment in this election campaign was that these ['peace process'] issues were never really on the table because there was no Palestinian leadership, there was no end to the terrorism, there was nobody to negotiate with. So there were no alternatives presented to the Israeli voters. It was who's going to do the best job of dealing with the terrible situation of terrorism that we face, and what are the best ways to try to deal with this… We're waiting for the Palestinians to be able to hold some sort of democratic elections, [including] a leadership change, and present us with alternatives that will really engage the Israeli population."

When journalists say, as some frequently do, that Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon promised peace and security and delivered neither – as if he has been operating in a vacuum – they should be reminded of Steinberg's words.

Making our contribution to the common good

By RABBI LAWRENCE PINSKER

Maurice Sendak's 1970 book In the Night Kitchen caused unexpected controversy. It surprised and even shocked older readers, who were unaccustomed to nudity and mysterious, seemingly inexplicable doings in a children's book. Mickey's adventures in the night kitchen – full of skyscraper-high milk bottles and flour boxes as big as apartment buildings – seemed, well, strange. But children loved the story.

I have fond memories of reading it to my children, but today I have a better understanding of its message: I think it shares an important theme with Terumah, this week's Torah portion. (Needless to say, I am sure Sendak never expected his work would become the subject of a dvar Torah.)

The book is simplicity itself. Little Mickey wakes up in the night and falls through the dark, out of his clothes, past his sleeping parents, into the night kitchen, a landscape of kitchen objects and commercial products grown to enormous size. He falls into a bowl of cake batter, which a group of bakers – each bearing an uncanny resemblance to Oliver Hardy – mix and stir and put it the oven to bake a "delicious Mickey-cake."

Mickey rebels, saying, "I'm not the milk and the milk's not me! I'm Mickey!" He then fashions an airplane from bread dough and flies off, but when the bakers cry out for milk to make their morning cake, Mickey flies to an enormous milk bottle, dives in and brings out the milk, singing, "I'm in the milk and the milk's in me. God bless milk and God bless me!"

Mickey pours milk into the batter, and the bakers make their cake. Proud of his accomplishments, Mickey slides down the milk bottle into bed. The story ends by noting the morning cake wouldn't have been possible without Mickey.

Sendak is a genius. Without a word of explanation, he brings us a child's view of the world. It is full of things that people before us have made, yet other projects await our attention and energy. Mickey doesn't want to be rolled and kneaded and pounded into a cake that he's had no role in developing. He has his own ideas of what he wants to do – to fly away – but when he is asked to help, he responds to the bakers' invitation. But he has to make the contribution in his own, distinctive way.

We Jews are very much like Mickey. After the Exodus, which marks the transition of our ancestors from their infancy as a people – dependent upon Egyptian culture, struggling to preserve the heritage of the Patriarchs and Matriarchs – we are immediately called by God to co-operate in a collaborative project, the building of the mishkan, a portable desert sanctuary, which will give God a place to dwell among the Israelites. The rest of the Book of Exodus focuses on the way B'nei Yisrael, newly freed from slavery, struggle with doubt and uncertainty to find a place in God's plans for their future.

> 'I'm not the milk and the milk's not me! I'm Mickey!'

All of us face this task: we are born into our tradition, finding expectations, roles and ideals. For many of us, the challenge is to figure out how to become part of a project worthy of our talents that contributes to the life of our family, society, people and heritage.

Many commentaries on this week's parshah note it was not beyond God's power to create a sanctuary for the Israelites out of nothing. After all, God created the universe and all its materials. But by not creating a sanctuary, God revealed that the human beings He had created are capable of achieving remarkable things through personal sacrifice and generosity – even bringing God's presence to dwell in the midst of the people Israel.

Prof. Yeshayahu Leibowitz once wrote about the parshah: "When people construct a sanctuary in honour of God, they bring the Shechinah down to dwell among them. The world acquires significance and value, if within its framework people serve God. It is not the world in itself that is significant: what is significant is the service of God in the world. And that is why the parshah of the sanctuary is so much more prominent in the Torah than is the parshah of creation."

Rabbi Henry Slonimsky once said that "a religious person is one who feels responsible for everyone else." The mishkan narrative and, on a humbler level, Sendak's In the Night Kitchen, both teach that someone is waiting for each of us – without exception – to contribute to the common good.

What would life be like if, God forbid, we flew away from the voices asking us to contribute our share to fulfilling God's plans for the sanctuary, the morning cake or a world of peace and caring?

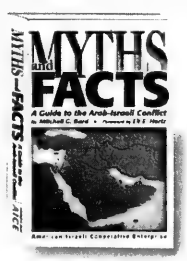
Closure of colleges necessary for protection

MYTH:

Israel closed three colleges in the Palestinian Authority in January 2003 to punish and humiliate the Palestinians.



FACT:

Despite more than two years of violence and provocation, some of which emanated from West Bank colleges, Israel did not interfere with classes. The hope was that Palestinians would focus their attention on their studies rather than on political activities. Unfortunately, these schools increasingly directed their energies to promoting violence rather than education. Israel did close the colleges, but only after it became clear that they had become centres of incitement and indoctrination rather than education.

When Israeli forces entered the schools, they found banners, posters, flags, tapes and children's notebooks adorned with pictures of suicide bombers. Classrooms were filled with posters praising terrorism and glorifying the bombers. Cassettes made by terrorist organizations and calling for the destruction of Israel were found. These were not just materials brought into the schools by students: some were distributed by the colleges themselves as part of the curriculum. They violated the peace agreements the Palestinians had signed forswearing such incitement.

In closing the colleges, Israel was attempting to protect its citizens, not punish or humiliate the Palestinians. Incidentally, the Palestinian Authority has also closed colleges in the territories on occasion when officials believed students were behaving in ways that threatened their authority.

Chicken soup: memories and humour

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Tevye: As the good book says, when a poor man eats a chicken, one of them is sick.

Mendel: Where does the good book say that?

Tevye: Well, it doesn't say that exactly, but somewhere there is something about a chicken [http://www.fortunecity.com/meltingpot/nicaragua/1105/fiddlerontheroof.html].

What is it about chicken soup that inspires the best in us? As you might expect, dozens of Web sites are dedicated to recipes for the best chicken soup. But you can also find countless stories, jokes, memoirs and poems devoted to this haymishe staple.

In A Mother's Love and Chicken Soup, Chava Willig Levy recalls a life lesson she learned from her mother and passed on to her children. On a Friday night in 1929, when her mother was six, she writes, "Everything was fine until her mother brought in the chicken soup. Somehow, by accident, Imma didn't get her portion. Quietly, she started to cry and a bowl was immediately brought to her. But Imma was inconsolable. When she continued to weep, her sister, our Aunt Lilly said, 'Listen, little one, have your soup while it's hot; you can always cry later.'"

Levy says her mother applied that philosophy throughout her life: Make someone's life better now; there will be time for tears another time [http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/Susieq/soup.htm].

The smell of chicken soup brings laughter as well as tears. "The fabulously wealthy banker Baron von Rothschild was traveling through the countryside and stopped for breakfast at a little deli. The soup was absolutely delicious. When he finished, the waiter brought him the bill. Rothschild was stunned: '$100 for a bowl of chicken soup,' he exclaimed. That's impossible. Is chicken soup so rare in these parts?' 'No,' replied the waiter, 'but Rothschilds are'" [http://www.s2f.com/psolley/sjokes.html].

Some people best express their chicken soup memories through poetry. "In my grandmother's house, there was always chicken soup..." That's how Louis Simpson begins his bittersweet reminiscence about the heartwarming smells that emanated from his grandmother's kitchen and how that scene was shattered by the Holocaust. The poem, called A Story about Chicken Soup, is in his collection At the End of the Open Road, which won the 1964 Pulitzer Prize for poetry. You can read the poem online at http://www.soupsong.com/ssimpson.html], along with Simpson's biography [http://www.cl.uh.edu/itc/course/LITR/4333/prsnanvi.htm].

Diana H. of New York writes about her safta (grandmother) and her soup on the Web site Teen Ink. "As I walk to the apartment, the smell carries me in, the fresh aroma of the soup, with some carrots, and most important, the chicken./ Then I spot the fresh noodles, and think of them drying in the hot sun of Israel, where she once lived./ Her presence was sacred; I wish that she was still here./ My favourite grandma, up above./ As I think of her every day, the chicken soup memories arise, and I feel her near me, watching with her brown eyes" [http://www.teenink.com/Past/1996/7395.html].

A delightful site, called the Jewish Penicillin Exchange: Memories of Chicken Soup, describes the ingredients bubbies used to include in their soup. Russ "Yussele" Goldberg recalls the unlaid eggs (which were included with the birds) and especially the chicken feese (feet) his bubbie put in her soup. "I guess today's butchers have found something profitable to do with the feet, egg sack and other parts that are no longer included when we buy a chicken. It's too bad, though. I'm sure these extra parts added a special flavour to that soup. That's probably why no soup I've eaten in the last 40 years or so compares with the memory of that soup, or do things just taste better in memory?" [http://gurlpages.com/uvula/soup.html].

Although most people remember a chicken soup dish close to perfection, things were different for Claudia Spevak. She recalls the time – the only time – her mother-in-law invited them over for a homecooked meal in 35 years. "She served chicken soup. The only problem is that she neglected to remove the onion skins. I practically choked to death on one of them... The advantage to all of this is that when your husband has a mother who cooked like this, he thinks everything you make is wonderful."

Next week, we eat!

The ancient challenge

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Over the next few weeks, we read in detail of the construction of the Tabernacle in the desert. The Tabernacle is a configuration of tents within tents, layers of curtained walls with no ceilings that can be assembled and taken down so as to move with Israel through the desert.

Deep within the Tabernacle's layers lies the Ark of the Covenant with the Ten Commandments. In its outer chambers, the Tabernacle contains all the articles necessary for sacrificial worship of God. It will dwell in the midst of the Israelite camp for 40 years.

The text goes to great length to share with us every measurement, every colour, every layer of the construction. In the end, we have a detailed portrait of a place of worship replete with all the necessary utensils. There is a table, a lampstand, an altar, an inner chamber, an outer chamber, an ark and many coverings. In fact, the articles themselves, although foreign to us, would probably have been familiar to the ancient Israelites.

Other cultures in the area likewise had places of worship for their gods. These places included within them tables, lampstands, altars and basins. If we were ancient Israelites, we would take comfort in the descriptions in the Torah as we could relate to these articles and would immediately understand that they are connected to religious worship. However, we would also notice a glaring omission that would challenge us greatly.

In all other cultures, although the utensils were similar, each article within the place of worship had etched into it a representation of the god, usually an image. Thus, the "holiness" of the article was achieved through its branding and the depiction of the idol. But nowhere in the description of the Tabernacle or its utensils do we see any indication of branding these articles with either the image or the name of God. As modern Jews, we would not expect to find this, but as ancient Israelites, we would immediately notice its absence.

In this way, the construction of the Tabernacle, a concrete structure in which to centralize worship, simultaneously conveys the essence of the abstract. In order to use these articles and engage in sacrifice – an extremely concrete means of communicating with God – we must recognize that God cannot be contained within the concrete but is ultimately abstract in essence.

As time progresses, sacrifice is replaced by prayer, but the issue remains the same. The challenge of any religious ritual remains to move beyond the concrete, beyond the mundane. The rabbis in the Talmud warn us against making our prayers routine, words without meaning. The physical page of the Siddur can often become the focal point rather than a way to move into the abstract, the dialogue with God.

In the Talmud, there are many suggestions of how to vary your prayers. Within those texts is a lengthy list of how each rabbi would end his daily prayers. These endings, which were personal and unique, allowed each sage his "signature," the break from routine.

As history continues to unfold today, the signature of Rabbi Safra speaks clearly and touchingly to every Jew: "May it be Your Will, O Lord our God, to establish peace in the household above and in the household below..."

The Tabernacle is gone and ancient pagan cultures have disappeared, yet our challenge remains the same.

The pitfalls of abolishing "custody" and "access"

Part One of Two

In the year 2000, 37.7% of Canadian marriages ended before their 30th anniversary. If you survive the fourth anniversary, the possibility of divorce diminishes with each passing year.

Children are profoundly affected. Recently, a Western Canadian Judge was correctly criticized for overreaching when he implied that all divorcing parents are selfish. However, the most "up-to-date" research may surprise you.

Are kids really better off removed from a strife-torn home?

The myth which gained prominence in the 1960s and 70s that divorced kids are usually "better off" to have left a home filled with tension than to have remained in it is often just that: a myth. (A home in which physical abuse occurs, of course, is another matter entirely).

It is also a myth that may be self-serving. In The Unexpected Legacy of Divorce, author Judith Wallerstein followed and studied two groups of children over a 25-year period: those of parents who divorced, and those of parents who stayed together (often for the sake of the children) despite their "unhappy marriage."

Dr. Wallerstein reports that the children of the divorced parents "are forming their own relationships, but are often haunted by fears of being doomed to repeat their parents' mistakes" and have significantly higher rates of divorce, suicide, substance abuse, sexual promiscuity, criminal conduct, low self-esteem and other emotional issues.

The reason is surprising: unless the parents are physically abusive to each other, kids care more about their own stability than problems between the parents, even if such problems create tension in the home. Moreover, children in troubled marriages at least have the relief of "truces" or "game plans" parents follow to deal with the tension, whereas children of permanent marital breakdown have "no such relief."

In such unhappy marriages, setting aside the adult differences as much as possible and co-operating over parenting sometimes means not getting divorced and establishing realistic parenting arrangements.

It is with this in mind that we should consider what the federal government and Justice Minister, the Honourable Martin Cauchon, is now attempting to accomplish with his recently proposed amendments to Canada's custody and access law (Bill C-22.) The new law abolishes the words "custody" and "access" and replaces them with the Court's ability to award "parenting responsibility" orders. According to the Justice Ministry's website: "the [old] terms encourage too many parents to focus on their rights rather than on their responsibilities and what is best for their children; the terms promote the idea of a "winner" and a "loser" who have fought a custody "battle".

The new language of custody legislation

The Minister has also committed the Government to investing $16.1 million annually to improve Court services to promote mediation; promote Judges more experienced in family law; and to provide other community services to help divorcing parents to sort out their respective responsibilities.

The announcement of new money on such services is crucial to the well-being of the children involved. Conflicts can often be resolved, or at least minimized reasonably quickly, with more experienced family Judges and earlier mediation.

Cape Breton businessman was 'an achiever'

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

Obituary

HALIFAX — The Jewish community of Cape Breton is mourning the loss of businessman and visionary leader Harvey Webber.

He died in Sydney, N.S., Jan. 28 at 88, one day after suffering a sudden heart attack. In typical Harvey Webber style, he didn't want to bother anyone with his pain. He called an ambulance early in the morning of Jan. 27, leaving a note for his sleeping wife to tell her where he was going.

"He was a unique character, an achiever, a doer," his longtime friend Irving Schwartz of Sydney told The Halifax Chronicle-Herald. "He was totally committed to the community."

Widely-respected as a retail business owner, Webber's love for his adopted home of Cape Breton led him to become one of the island's most innovative champions. He helped create campaigns to promote local products.

He also played a key role in the development of the Glace Bay Miners Museum, which still serves as a living tribute to the rich history of the island's coal mining industry.

"He had a constant flow of ideas and the ability to transform the ideas into projects, to carry them forward," Schwartz told the Cape Breton Post. "I think it's a huge loss for this community."

Born in Halifax, Webber graduated from Dalhousie Law School in 1937. He moved to Sydney to take over a women's hat store that his father owned in the city. He gradually transformed the shop into multiple boutiques called Smart Shop Place, which became an instant success and remains an anchor in Sydney's downtown business core.

A recipient of the Order of Canada and Queen's Golden Jubilee Medal, Webber was named Distinguished Retailer of the Year by the Retail Council of Canada in 1991.

In the early 1980s, he served as director of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. In addition, Webber helped create the Cape Breton Tourist Association, often chaired the United Way, and developed the Centennial Arena in Sydney, and the General Mining Building in Glace Bay.

His Relocation and Retirement to Cape Breton program is now being successfully administered by the Cape Breton County Economic Development Authority to attract people to retire on the island. He also served as the first chair of Silicon Island, Cape Breton's first multimedia and digital technology incubation centre.

For many decades, Webber served the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. He was also named an honorary fellow of Hebrew University in 1978 and was honoured by Hadassah WIZO in 1981 for "his service to his fellow man."

Bruce Meloney, an independent retailer in Smart Shop Place, told the Cape Breton Post that Webber's " favourite saying was 'It's not what you know, it's what you do with what you know.' He knew lots and he did lots. He would get you to think of setting your standards high, and then shoot for it. It wasn't important if you made it. If you set the standard high and only achieved three-quarters, you're way ahead. He was marvellous at doing that."

A member of Temple Sons of Israel, Webber is survived by his wife Ethel, daughter Marlene in Toronto, son Laurie in Halifax and three grandchildren.

CJC, CIC congratulate Sharon

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish community leaders congratulated Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week after his Likud party won the most seats in the Jan. 28 national election.

"The strength of Israel's democracy has once again been demonstrated as the country elected its 16th Knesset and Israeli voters have given Prime Minister Sharon another mandate to govern," said Keith Landy, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress. "We wish him success in forming a government and wise counsel in these very difficult times for the State of Israel."

Landy also paid tribute to Labor Party leader Amram Mitzna and the other party leaders for their hard-fought campaign.

Joseph Wilder, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, sent Sharon a letter of congratulations.

"The citizens of Israel have clearly expressed their desire for the renewal of [Sharon's] leadership," Wilder wrote.

"We respect their decision, and celebrate the reaffirmation of the vibrant democracy that characterizes the Jewish state. Canadian Jews are confident that Mr. Sharon will continue to focus all of his energies on leading Israel towards peace with security in the region. All Israelis desperately yearn for these goals."

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 30th, 2003.

Pipes on campus:
Who's intimidating whom?

By HOWARD ADELMAN

Comment

What accusations were thrown at Daniel Pipes, the Mideast scholar and director of the Middle East Forum, who spoke last week at York University despite attempts to ban him by students and faculty members?

Some of the accusations, such as Pipes does nothing to advance Mideast studies, were blatantly false. Some, such as Pipes does not "foster meaningful debate," were mild. Some, such as Pipes lacks "goodwill" and fails to work for "a peaceable world" – as if these are criteria for scholarship – were ludicrous. Others said Pipes engaged in "intimidation." Still others worried that there could be violence and "abuse of [York Student Centre] staff," though no one suggested that Pipes would be the source of abuse or pointed out the real intimidators.

Most of the controversy surrounded Pipes' allegedly McCarthyite Web site, Campus Watch. The term McCarthyism refers to U.S. Senator Joseph McCarthy's practice in the 1950s of accusing people, often with little evidence, of corruption or membership in subversive organizations. Those accused often lost their jobs and went to jail.

Campus Watch, on the other hand, monitors and critiques professors and universities on their approach to Mideast studies and aims to correct such problems as intimidation and abuse on campus. In it, Pipes cites the work of certain academics and argues that they are apologists for terrorism. He also prints responses to his criticisms. While he respects these academics' freedom of speech, he insists on his "own freedom to comment on their words and deeds."

Though the site is not a technique I would endorse to debate whether certain departments should be funded for their research – one of Pipes' goals – it clearly falls within the bounds for intellectual debate. Yet Pipes has been depicted as a crass "anti-academic agitator," a manipulator who proscribes debate, polices faculty and fans "the flames of disinformation, incitement, and ignorance." The executive of the York University Faculty Association even claimed that Pipes "is committed to a racist agenda." Others were even more extreme, saying he is "engaged" in a "calibre of violence."

As a research scholar on refugee and immigration issues, I was offended by Pipes' New York Post article of Aug. 27, 2002 entitled Something Rotten in Denmark? In it, he argued that Muslims comprise a majority of Denmark's convicted rapists (what is his source?), and that the country's immigrants, mostly Muslim, use 40 per cent of Danish welfare. But that number depends on the type of welfare focused on. (It is misleading to use a welfare benefit that is targeted at immigrants to prove the percentage is high.) Further, immigrant welfare benefits are a valuable investment in productivity.

I deplore Pipes' lack of a scholarly basis or context, and I would disagree with his charges that some Muslims engage in forced marriages, threaten other Muslims who convert and foment anti-Semitism. But I strongly defend his right to make those assertions. They may be false and misleading, evidently inspired by a threat to murder several prominent Danish Jews, but they are not racist.

The York University academic campaign against Pipes is a case of the pot calling the kettle black. Those who felt intimidated by the anti-Pipes faction chose to support the cancellation of the York Centre for International and Security Studies' co-sponsorship of his talk. (Prof. David Dewitt, the centre's director, had initially agreed to co-sponsor the lecture with the Jewish Student Federation, but withdrew following protests.) It was a cowardly campaign unworthy of academics. Many used damning words and phrases with much greater liberty than Pipes. Compared to them, Pipes is genteel and civilized.

Howard Adelman teaches philosophy at York University and is a member of the York Centre for International and Security Studies. An interview with Pipes aired Feb. 2 on his show Israel Today on CTS television. For a copy, e-mail howardadelman@rogers.com.

Associated scholarships available

Associated Hebrew Schools is currently accepting applications for scholarships for students to study at post-secondary institutions of Jewish learning in Israel for the 2003/4 academic year.

The scholarships are awarded annually to qualified candidates through the school's scholarship and endowment fund.

For the 2002/3 academic year, more than $11,000 has been allocated to: Sara Greenwood, studying at Midreshet Lindenbaum; Maytal Helfand and Mark Jesin, studying at Hebrew University; Benjamin Noy, studying at Yeshivat Torat Moshe; Jory Scherer, studying at Yeshivat Darchei Noam; and Daniela Steinman and Eiran Warner, studying at Bar Ilan University.

Candidates must be graduates of Associated and of a recognized Jewish day high school or yeshiva. Special scholarships are available to students preparing for a career in Jewish education.

The awards are for a single year of study, but students may apply for additional years. Payment is conditional upon the successful completion of the approved program.

For application forms from the Associated Hebrew Schools Scholarship Committee, visit the school's Danilack campus at 6100 Leslie St., or call 416-494-7666, ext. 334. Deadline for applications is March 31.

Why Pipes speech was cancelled

The following is a response from York University professor David Dewitt to Howard Adelman's article on the previous page. Dewitt is the director of the York Centre for International and Security Studies.

Dear Howard,

Thank you for sharing with me the draft of your article for the Canadian Jewish News. You won't be surprised to read that I disagree with you, just as I'm not surprised, given our earlier and ongoing discussions, that you were disappointed with the decision reached by the York Centre for International and Security Studies (YCISS) to cancel its academic co-sponsorship of the recent talk at York University by Daniel Pipes.

Let us be clear: YCISS did not argue against Pipes speaking at York. His academic work, though controversial, can and should be debated. Our only decision was to withdraw co-sponsorship when a significant majority of YCISS colleagues concluded that his association with Campus Watch compromised the academic character of the event. Had we been aware of Pipes' involvement with Campus Watch when we were approached to co-sponsor, we would have rejected the invitation.

Although I have made it clear that my personal preference would have been a different outcome – indeed, the one you also preferred – our difference is that I do think that the decision reflects a serious and honest effort to engage what Pipes has written and done, and to ask some tough questions about how that fits with issues of academic freedom, institutional responsibility, and what our research centre is called on to do. I don't believe that colleagues acted out of intimidation, although I acknowledge that there were moments throughout this time that individuals felt very uncomfortable; some from those supportive of Pipes, some from those critical. In the end people tried, as best they could, to separate that from the core issues at hand, including academic freedom.

I don't think that the decision taken by YCISS was either "cowardly" or "unworthy of academics" as you've stated. Yes, it was and remains contentious. Yes, some of us stood on the other side of the decision. And yes, we certainly may continue to disagree about the extent to which Pipes' involvement in Campus Watch should shift the balance against his claims on the academy to provide him a forum. That noted, I don't think your statement is entirely a fair representation of the quality of our discussion, perhaps a result of your inability to attend either of our two centre meetings.

Moreover, I think it is important to remember that just as it was not incumbent on YCISS to agree to co-sponsor, it was not incumbent on us to continue once the ground had shifted in terms of our more complete knowledge of Pipes, notably his connection to Campus Watch and, notably, the fact that this was hidden when we went to his Web site. Co-sponsorship was not problematic when the record was scholarship alone, however contentious his work might seem to some. His academic writing was worthy of serious engagement, though with the introduction of the Campus Watch factor, suddenly we also faced the blurring of co-sponsorship with endorsement, something that clearly we were not prepared to assume.

It is the interpretation of Campus Watch which leads to our differences and, as you know, the majority of our colleagues at the centre were sufficiently disturbed by Pipes' opaque use of the Internet to encourage the types of activities, including reporting and listing of campus activities, that would engender silencing. They concluded it would be inappropriate to continue co-sponsorship of someone involved in creating an intellectual chill.

Whatever the decision, there inevitably would be differences of opinion. As you know well, I had wanted to operate on the basis of providing the platform and then having him be engaged and challenged, and I maintained that position even as we discussed Campus Watch. However, as director of the centre, it was my view that any decision should emerge

Tribes of Israel were not lost, says academic

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Forget what the scholars tell us. Forget the centuries of Jewish folklore. Forget the Simcha Jacobovici film. The lost tribes of Israel, says University of Toronto academic Mark Leuchter, don't have to be found because they were never lost.

"If you want to know where the lost tribes of Israel are, then go to your synagogue and look around and that's where you'll find them," Leuchter told a full house at University of Toronto recently as part of a lecture called The "Lost Tribes of Israel": Which Way Did They Go? The event was held at Woodsworth College as part of the university's Jewish studies program.

Leuchter said he believes the 10 exiled tribes settled in southern Judea and reintegrated into the Jewish population, while smaller numbers stayed in Samaria, assimilated or, eventually, as members of the remaining tribes, established communities in the Diaspora. His theory is partly based on Jerusalem population statistics; within 20 years of the Assyrian exile, the population of Jerusalem tripled, and traditions from the kingdom of Israel began to appear in Judea. While historians can't say for certain what caused the population increase, he said the likelihood of a correlation between the exiled tribes and the rise in population is strong. After the Assyrian exile, the 10 tribes lost their "glory as the jewel of the Near East," their links to Africa and Asia and their oral traditions. But the people themselves, said Leuchter, weren't lost at all.

"They never lost touch with Jerusalem and other Jews," he said.

In 736 BCE, the Assyrians exiled the 10 northern tribes from the kingdom of Samaria. The book of Kings says exactly where the deported tribes went – to Halah, Habor by the Gozan River and Media – but Leuchter points out that geographically we don't know where these places are.

"We have no idea where they went on one level, and a perfectly good idea on another," he said.

The story of the lost tribes, said Leuchter, has been debated for thousands of years. "It's like the myth of King Arthur or the [Indiana Jones movie] Raiders of the Lost Ark." His controversial theory goes against the commonly held belief that all Jews today are from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, the two that weren't affected by the Assyrians and who comprised the kingdom of Judea.

In Israel today, Leuchter said, the search for the lost tribes is compelling and often controversial. Rabbi Eliyahu Avichayil recently converted a group of Jews near Myanmar who called themselves Shevet Menashe. Many people argue the Ethiopian Jews are the tribe of Dan. The Samaritans, the world's smallest ethnic group, are the descendants of Jews who remained in the northern kingdom after the exile and mixed with the Assyrians.

Leuchter is the Ray D. Wolfe fellow of U of T's Jewish studies department. He worked on the Simcha Jacobovici documentary Quest for the Lost Tribes.

First Nations guests join Tu b'Shvat seder

By NAOMI LEVITZ
Special to The CJN

Tu b'Shvat – the new year of the trees – is a time to celebrate rebirth, renewal and regeneration.

This Tu b'Shvat, the congregation at Beth Tzedec Congregation invited some special guests. On Jan. 17, Alex McKay, Dorothy Peters, Mike White and Jonathan Hamilton-Diabo of the University of Toronto's First Nations House came to join with the congregation in a celebration of Shabbat, the earth and unity.

It was a meeting of different cultures, featuring singing and stories. Led by Rabbi Aubrey Glazer, the seder contained Israeli poetry and readings related to the Kabbalah.

First Nations guests join seder

Commonalities found in Ojibwa, Mohawk and Jewish teachings were discussed, focusing on their relationship to nature.

Participants were impressed with the number of links between the two cultures.

The Jewish part of the seder celebrated the energy and potential we all have. It gave credit to the four elements of earth, wind, water and fire, as well as the four directions – north, south, east and west. These principles are also central to native spirituality.

A medicine wheel – a traditional native tool used to teach young people in North American native cultures – was presented. While there are many different types of medicine wheels, they are all divided into four equal sections, often representing the four directions and stressing the interconnectedness of everything. The four sections of each circle are interdependent, showing that without one, the other parts cannot function.

Hamilton-Diabo, an academic adviser, said the wheel at the seder represents four major races of the earth. Each has a different function and teaches about different aspects of life.

U of T student Peters expanded on this concept and spoke of the importance of togetherness in the Jewish and native communities, describing them as two different parts of the same whole.

The evening ended with songs and laughter, with many stories shared after the program came to a close. The native community members sang along with Jewish prayers, and the Jewish participants came away with a sense of oneness, and a new beginning: not only a new year for the trees, but new beginning for our two communities as well.

Naomi Levitz is majoring in equity studies, sociology and native studies at University of Toronto.

'We will all learn from the Pipes incident'

from a thoughtful and honest discussion, ensuring that all involved understood the issues and the consequences of any decision. I know that you and I differ on that. I remain proud of the efforts undertaken by all our colleagues at the centre – faculty, students, staff – including you who provided the first thorough analysis for us of Pipes' academic writing, his journalism, as well as Campus Watch. And in your excellent analysis, which is part of our publically accessible Web site record, you indicate support for the process that I undertook.

I recognize, as we've discussed, that there is a larger problem of intellectual and political intolerance all too evident on our campuses. This is worthy of careful and serious discussion and perhaps we'll all learn from the Pipes incident how better to handle these things in this strained environment. I also admit that YCISS stumbled into the midst of all this, perhaps naively but nevertheless honestly, after having made an initial decision based on what we thought was appropriate information but which, in hindsight, turned out to be seriously incomplete. Ironically, of course, the centre and I are now a target of Campus Watch, having suddenly appeared on their Web site, and thereby now labelled as anti-Israeli and anti-American by association, something utterly absurd and insulting, as well as being factually wrong.

I am puzzled by your ability to shrug off Pipes' article, Something is Rotten in Denmark as merely offensive. Recently at York you, I, and other colleagues took strong exception to a visiting professor who wrote and spoke of the "nazification of Israel." We challenged this as offensive and bad scholarship but also as crossing the line of what was acceptable under the norm of academic freedom. We questioned the appropriateness of his association with York University. For some, aspects of Pipes' work, including Campus Watch, are viewed in a similar way.

As ever,
David

Pipes calls academic barriers more insidious

Although Pipes called street-level objections to free speech "barbaric," he said academic barriers are more insidious. "[Such objection] has the air of civility, but it too would shoot down debate… through more subtle forms."

He cited grading of student work, selective granting of honorary degrees and his own visit to York as examples.

Although his JSF-sponsored talk proceeded uneventfully, with the exception of non-violent protests, his participation in a lunch hosted by York's Centre for International and Security Studies was cancelled by the centre's director, Prof. David Dewitt. While such behaviour is "usually categorized as political correctness," Pipes maintained it is as dangerous as calling for disruption of free speech.

Dewitt has said that Pipes' affiliation with Campus Watch led to the lunch's cancellation. "Campus Watch was seen by many as an effort to silence competing voices. We don't like the idea of intimidation of any kind," Dewitt told the Toronto Star.

After reading the mission statement posted on the home page of his controversial Web site – which states in part that Campus Watch "monitors and critiques Middle East studies in North America, with an aim to improving them" – Pipes said that "the notion that we're engaged in a racist agenda [with] a methodology of intimidation and harassment [as critics claim] is pure, unadulterated calumny."

It's necessary for society to pay attention to what goes on at universities, said the Harvard-educated academic. "There is a tendency to let the university go in its own direction… It is time to take these institutions back."

He noted during his press conference that North American universities have become intolerant to alternative points of view. "One doesn't find this kind of debate foreclosed in the media or in government-sponsored activities."

Turning his attention to the Middle East, Pipes said he prefers to be known as a foreign policy analyst rather than a pro-Israel academic, but affirmed his sympathy for Israel in the context of a wider sympathy for democracy.

Both Arabs and Israelis have misread each other in the past, said Pipes, who is director of the Middle East Forum, a Philadelphia-based think tank.

Because Israelis made concessions and offered little in return in the Oslo accords, they "unwittingly sent the message that they were weak and demoralized," Pipes said. "The force of the violence now stems from the fact that Palestinians saw what Israel was doing and misread it."

Pipes does not agree that Palestinian violence represents an attempt to get a better [land-for-peace] deal. "The idea that Israel could be destroyed never went away." Even Palestinian crossword puzzles perpetuate the idea, he said, citing the clue "Palestinian city" and the answer "Haifa," which "implies that all of Israel is Palestine."

But the Palestinians' two-year-old "strategy of violence is not working," Pipes said, because Israelis are unified and determined.

The key barrier to peace is ongoing Arab rejection of Israel, Pipes believes. "Only when they come to see Israel as a permanent fact can there be a resolution."

The outside world needs to work for an Arab change of heart, he said. "This is what our foreign policies must address."

Only at that time can negotiations begin, he said, adding that Palestinians are paying a terrible price because of their own violence.

Israel is also paying a price, he noted, but Israel is functioning and Palestinian society is "stopped…When Arab rejection toward Israel dies, then and only then will the conflict die and the Palestinians find a better life."

Israel's first astronaut: A tragedy beyond translation

Until the fiery contrails began to seize and hold their televisions sets, many Americans had been unaware that the shuttle was aloft at all, so routine and seemingly dependable had space flight become in the 17 years since they had mourned for the Challenger crew.

For Israelis, however, there was nothing humdrum about the kosher food that had been specified by Colonel Ilan Ramon, a secular Jew who felt his allegiance belonged to his people at least as much to the credo of the Right Stuff, a tradition that might as well have looked askance on deviance from the American norm.

Neither was there anything the least common about his decision to take aboard a picture drawn by a star-struck boy later killed by the Nazis in Auschwitz, a place that Ramon's mother had somehow survived. The picture, dark and dreamy, showed the earth as seen from the moon.

Nor was there anything in the least ordinary about the fact that unbeknownst to him, the little boy's sister survived the war and moved to Be'er Sheva, where the little boy's niece was in Ilan's high school class. "My brother is finally getting a chance to go into space," said the slain artist's sister, as Columbia lifted off last month.

For many in Israel, the tragedy's cruelty slammed home with a force that seemed even more overwhelming than the tides of terrorism that had set cities aflame and claimed hundreds of deaths over the past 28 months. An uncommonly beautiful day turned without warning into a hell of waiting for good news that never came.

"We've known so many losses throughout this period, loss of life through terror and fighting, as well as loss of hope, and suddenly Ilan Ramon comes forward as a new hope for Israel, a symbol of the capability that we could feel again," clinical psychologist Yael Magal-David said Sunday.

The astronaut had also reminded Israelis of an Israel that itself seemed all but lost. In such gestures as listening in space to a poignant song by the pre-state poetess Rachel, Ramon displayed a respectful innocence that harkened to earlier, less disillusioned times.

"Flying into space, Ilan Ramon made childhood wishes come true for all of us – a piece of all of us travelled with him," Magal-David said. At the same time, "he very much strengthened our sense of unity and belonging, both in his actions and in the symbols of Jewish and Israeli heritage that he took with him to space," she said, using the untranslatable expression melach ha'aretz, connoting a quietly wonderful son of Israel's soil, to describe the fallen astronaut.

"He went in search of a better world," his widow, Rona Ramon, was quoted as telling Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon late Saturday. In fact, he found it, and through him, his countrymen found it as well, in his poetically modest depictions of watching a little country of uncommon beauty that, from that vantage point, he was the first Israeli ever to see.

And Israelis watched him as well. For three days last month, children across the country rose before dawn to turn to the southeastern sky for a glimpse of what appeared to be a silver arrow poised above the Mediterranean – a tiny spaceship big enough to carry the dreams of a million children.

"When those rockets fire, we're going into space, I as well as all of you," Ramon said in his last interview to the uncustomarily exhilarated Army Radio interviewer Rafi Reshef, who confessed to an equally unexpected envy.

That envy was shared by many, along with the close identification with the flight – a state of affairs that made the fiery end of the shuttle mission that much harder to bear.

"My 14-year-old daughter always really wanted to be an astronaut, that's what she always said," a Rishon Letzion resident named Riki told a television call-in show Sunday morning, during a segment devoted to counselling parents of children distraught over the shuttle disaster.

"She was glued to the [shuttle] liftoff, and every day was so interested and watched all the broadcasts on the flight. She envied Ilan Ramon so much. Yesterday, she was on a picnic, and after she heard the news, she called us up, and said it had happened because of her, because of her envy. Until 11 o'clock last night, she simply could not stop herself from crying."

"This country, so accustomed to cynicism, looked up to its man in space," wrote Ha'aretz commentator Ari Shavit on Sunday. "This country, so used to looking down on itself, held its breath at the prospect of a different reality, that of a country that can defy the gravity of its fate."

The white contrails that signalled the disaster, Shavit wrote, came to symbolize "this hope that keeps shattering, the hope of freeing ourselves from our gravitational destiny, of floating in some weightless normalcy in utter disregard of the gravity of our existence."

Magal-David noted that the grief was also influenced by the fact that Ramon – in 1981, he had been the last F-16 pilot to attack the Iraqi nuclear reactor and thus the most vulnerable to anti-aircraft fire – had been killed in an American craft. Israelis could therefore cast their anger elsewhere.

"We don't have to feel that we didn't do enough to prevent this. We are, therefore, left with our feelings of grief and loss," she said.

The tragedy "goes against every single thing we were taught at home and in the gan [kindergarten]," said a Jerusalem-area woman, an Israeli-born daughter of Holocaust survivors who grew up in the United States and for whom the shuttle launch had rekindled memories of the fevered excitement that space flight had generated in the otherwise gravely troubled America of the 1960s.

"We were told that under no circumstances do we leave the bodies of the fallen in the field. When did we last leave people going up in flames in a metal box that belongs to someone else, where they turn into ashes? In Auschwitz. I thought we didn't do that anymore. That's what they told me. That's why I'm here. Because we don't do that anymore. So how could something like this have happened?"

Israel & the Jewish World

'Part of the heavy price for exploring other worlds'

Sagi Moran, 17, whose older sister participated in the science project, said they both cried when they learned of Ramon's death. "Every time I look at the pictures, I get a chill. I still can't digest it," she said.

The deaths of the seven astronauts were not in vain, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Sunday, and there will be other Israeli astronauts in the future.

"The day will come when we will launch more astronauts into space," he said at the opening of the weekly cabinet meeting. "I am sure that each and every one of them will carry in his heart the memory of Ilan Ramon, a pioneer in Israeli space travel."

The explosion of the shuttle is part of the heavy price for exploring other worlds, he said.

"Americans and Israelis are brothers indeed, on Earth and in space," said U.S. ambassador to Israel Daniel Kurtzer at the government meeting. He said Israel and America shared losses as well as victories, and that they would remain partners.

"The chances an accident would happen in space are very small," Ramon told Ma'ariv last month. "As far as safety goes, I'm not concerned at all," he said.

"During takeoff you are sitting on a barrel of explosives that contains two million litres of fuel. The shuttle consumes 4,000 litres a second during the first eight hours of takeoff, until it starts orbiting around the earth," Ramon said. "In NASA, safety takes precedence over everything else. The shuttle has backup upon backup upon backup."

Ramon, 48, was an air force colonel. His military career included the 1981 bombing of an Iraqi nuclear reactor, a milestone for Israeli aviation, since the planes flew over Arab territory for hours without detection. The pilots flew in a tight formation to send off a radar signal resembling that of a large commercial airliner.

Ramon, who got his wings in 1974, had logged 4,000 hours of flight time and was part of the first Israeli squad to pilot American-made F-16 fighter jets in 1980. He also fought in the 1973 Yom Kippur War and in the Lebanon War.

"I joined the Air Force exactly 30 years ago, and have been flying ever since," Ramon told Ma'ariv. "I was involved in several accidents, two of them serious. I had to abort, but thank God I made it in one piece. Accidents in fear are history for me."

In 1983, Ramon left the IDF to take an undergraduate degree in electronic and computer engineering at Tel Aviv University, which he received in 1987. One year later he returned to the Israel Air Force (IAF) as second-in-command of a Phantom squadron. He became colonel in 1994.

In 1997, he was selected to be Israel's first astronaut. "One evening, someone from [IAF] personnel called me and said, 'Do you want to be an astronaut?'" Ramon told Yedioth Ahronoth prior to the Columbia launch. "I said, 'Stop kidding me, I don't have time for jokes.' Then he told me that the air force commander had asked us to find someone to become an astronaut," Ramon said.

Ramon said that as a child, he wanted to be a basketball player, but he wasn't tall enough. Since the shuttle cabin is two square metres, "this time I'll benefit from my short height," he said.

He began his preparations as an astronaut in 1997 as a payload specialist. He spent much of Columbia's 16-day flight aiming cameras in an Israel Space Agency study of how desert dust and other contaminants in the earth's atmosphere affect rainfall and temperature.

Ramon, whose mother and grandmother survived the Holocaust, brought onto the space shuttle a small pencil drawing titled Moon Landscape by Peter Ginz, a 14-year-old killed in Auschwitz.

He also had a tiny Torah scroll a 13-year-old boy received in Bergen-Belsen from the rabbi of Amsterdam in order to study for his bar mitzvah. The boy, Yehoyahin Yosef, survived the Holocaust, immigrated to Israel, became a professor of planetary physics and was the person who oversaw the Israeli experiment on board the shuttle to check the impact of dust on climate conditions.

In addition, Ramon packed a credit-card-sized microfiche of the Bible given to him by President Moshe Katsav, as well as some mezuzot.

Ramon's wife Rona and their four children, who have been in the United States with him since he began his training as an astronaut, and his father Eliezer Wolferman, 79, were on hand for his take-off into space.

At the time, Wolferman said the media blitz in Israel about the Columbia mission was excessive, and called for "a little more modesty" about an Israeli's first space mission.

Ramon's brother Gadi left a sealed letter aboard the Columbia – his brother was to read it only after the shuttle went into space. The astronaut's 15-year-old son Assaf also left his father a note to be opened only in space. Assaf said that he would also like to be a pilot or astronaut and said he misses life in Israel.

Ramon was not religious, but asked to eat kosher food in orbit – the first time it was ever placed on a space mission.

"I'm secular in my background, but I'm going to respect all kinds of Jews all over the world," Ramon said. "For Israel and for the Jewish community, it's a very symbolic event."

In a conversation with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Education Minister Limor Livnat last week, Ramon said, "Israel looks from here just like it does on the map, small but charming… We have a wonderful people, and it is very important to preserve our heritage," he said.

The IDF has set up an e-mail address for the public to send condolence messages to Ramon's family. The address is ilan-family@mail.idf.il.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2003 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 21, 2003. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 28, 2003.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 13, 2003. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Important Message for Canada's Permanent Residents

Make your re-entry into Canada easier

Save time and money; obtain your Permanent Resident (PR) Card before you travel.

- Who needs the new PR Card: Permanent residents (landed immigrants) who travel internationally by commercial carrier will need a PR Card to return to Canada as of December 31, 2003.

Canadian Citizens do not need a PR Card.

- Where you need to show your PR Card: If you are a permanent resident (landed immigrant) returning to Canada on a commercial carrier, you must show your PR Card to carrier personnel when boarding an airplane, boat, train or bus.

If you are a permanent resident travelling abroad without a valid PR Card as of December 31, 2003, you may not be permitted to board an airplane, boat, train or bus back to Canada. You may be referred to the closest Canadian embassy or consulate to obtain a limited use travel document. This may result in travel delays and extra costs for you.

- Becoming Canadian: Many permanent residents who can become Canadian citizens are encouraged to apply for their citizenship.

- How to get your PR Card: Application kits are available through Citizenship and Immigration Canada's web site (www.cic.gc.ca) or by calling the PR Card Call Centre (1 800 255-4541).

Applications are being processed based on your year of landing. Check the chart to see in which month you should apply, and apply early. For example, if your year of landing was 1998, you should submit your application on May 1, 2003.

Mubarak surprises Sharon with invitation for peace talks

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newpspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon won his first political points after his election victory last week when Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak surprised the Prime Minister's Office with a phone call to congratulate Sharon and invite him for talks after he forms a new government.

The venue and date have yet to be set, and according to a PMO statement, "the two discussed the peace process in the Middle East."

Mubarak has so far refused to meet with Sharon. He has also often attacked him, and the two have exchanged barbs on a number of occasions. Last week's invitation surprised the PMO, but Mubarak prepared his own public for the political shift with comments before the Israeli vote that "we must step up the contacts with Sharon, who will be re-elected, and deal with him in a different way, because silence has not helped."

In recent weeks, Egypt has been trying to re-establish itself as a leader of the Mideast peace process, in the hopes of improving its relations with Washington. Cairo orchestrated and conducted so-far-unsuccessful cease-fire talks among Palestinian factions. According to Mubarak, "Egypt is not asking the Palestinians to end the jihad or the resistance to the occupation, but just to agree to a cease-fire that would embarrass Israel."

Mubarak adviser Osama el Baz escorted Mubarak's son Gamal on his first trip to the United States for formal meetings with senior Bush administration officials this week. They visited New York and Texas and Washington, D.C. Before leaving, el Baz said Egypt fears chaos and instability in the region because of the collapse of the peace process and the possible ramifications of an American attack on Iraq.

Israeli officials believe Egypt will ask the Americans for special aid on the eve of the Iraqi war, as Israel, Jordan and Turkey have done. The United States has so far linked such aid to Egypt's performance in case of war in the region.

The Egyptians have responded to the U.S. signals, which were accompanied by threats to cut off aid, and a few weeks ago released a high-profile civil rights activist, Saad Eddin Ibrahim, who has been granted a new trial on charges of "tarnishing Egypt's reputation."

Mubarak called Sharon about 10 days after a visit by Suleiman to Sharon's ranch to discuss the "Gaza First" plan proposed by Ben-Eliezer. But Sharon refused to take the call, saying he was busy. The next day he called back.

Three weeks ago, Halevy visited Cairo openly for the first time as chairman of Israel's National Security Council, and not as chief of the Mossad. The Egyptians reportedly got the impression Israel was seeking to broaden the dialogue between the two countries and that Halevy had a mandate for that dialogue.

That might be the reason for Mubarak's optimism when he said last week: "Maybe there will be some improvements in Sharon's positions and this will be a new opportunity after the elections to push the peace process forward and cease the violence."

Changes to Belgian war crimes law could snare Sharon

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — The Belgian Senate ratified two key amendments last Friday that aimed to keep alive a 10-year-old war crimes law under which international leaders can be indicted. Under the amendments, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon could stand trial in Belgum after he retires from politics.

Following a four-hour debate, the 71-member upper chamber of the parliament ratified the amendments 34 to 6, with 6 abstentions, clearing the way for Belgium's House of Representatives to approve them in the next few weeks. The two revisions aim to toughen the 1993 law and make it easier for victims of war crimes to bring cases against sitting or retired world leaders.

One of the proposed amendments would allow Belgian prosecutors to start preliminary investigations into suspected war criminals even if the suspects are not in Belgium, doing away with current restrictions in the law that state accused persons must reside in the country. However, the amendment also allows Belgian authorities to better screen out and reject those cases which do not have a link to Belgium.

The second proposed law would grant Belgian courts jurisdiction over cases that can't be brought before the new International Criminal Court.

Human rights groups and the Belgian government – which backs the amendments – have argued that without the changes, the law would be useless in bringing war crimes cases to Belgian courts against such world leaders as Sharon or Cuban President Fidel Castro. Both of them, along with other notable leaders such as Iraqi President Saddam Hussein, have had claims brought against them in the last few years.

Eight human rights groups, inciuding Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch have urged the Belgian government to move quickly in adopting the revisions, saying time is running out. The amendments must be fully approved by the national parliament before it dissolves ahead of May 18 elections.

"Laws like this one are essential to overcome the walls of immunity behind which tyrants and torturers brutalize people in their own countries," the group of eight said last week.

The Sharon case was thrown out last June on the basis that he was not living in Belgium, raising doubts whether cases against other world leaders under the contentious law could go ahead.

Israel has already expressed its strong concerns to Belgium on the amendments, fearing it could restart the case against Sharon. Belgian prosecutors accused Sharon of responsibility for a 1982 massacre of Palestinians by Lebanese Christians near Beirut.

So far, the only people to have been tried under the Belgian war crimes law are four Rwandans. The four were sentenced last year to between 12 and 20 years in jail for their role in the 1994 genocide of the country's Tutsi ethnic minority.

Israel girds for Iraqi attack

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Anticipating a massive U.S. invasion of Iraq within weeks or months, Israel went on high alert on Jan. 15, mindful that a cornered Saddam Hussein might unleash chemical and/or biological weapons against what he contemptuously refers to as the "Zionist entity."

Although no one can be certain whether Iraq will target Tel Aviv and other Israeli cities, Israel, as Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz noted recently, has prudently prepared itself for that grim scenario.

Apart from the precautions of distributing gas masks and inoculating thousands of health care workers and soldiers with smallpox vaccines, Israel has taken two major steps in anticipation of the looming war in Iraq.

Last month, Israel successfully tested its homegrown Arrow anti-missile system as well as its improved Patriot missile batteries. About 600 American troops, currently based in Israel, participated in the exercises.

The Arrow is designed to detect and destroy enemy missiles at altitudes of more than 50 kilometres. The Patriot is supposed to intercept missiles at lower altitudes. Both work in conjunction with the Green Pine radar system and the Ofek-5 spy satellite.

Produced in tandem with the United States, the Arrow was developed in reaction to the Patriots' disappointing performance in the 1991 Gulf War, when Iraq fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel.

Experts consider the Arrow a state-of-the art weapon, but it is not foolproof. Still, as Israeli armed forces chief of staff Gen. Moshe Ya'alon has said, Israel is better prepared today than the last time around.

Bolstered by the Arrow and the Patriot, and Iraq's military decline since the imposition of United Nations sanctions, Israel is far stronger than it was in 1991.

As Ya'alon put it, " I am not losing any sleep over the Iraqi threat, since over the last decade, a significant gap has opened between the Iraqi and Israeli capability."

Picking up on this theme, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said Israel will know how to defend itself should Iraq lash out at Israel.

Several months before his resignation last year as Israel's defence minister, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer said that the probability of an Iraqi attack was high. But subsequently, he modified his view, saying the chances were low.

Israel's head of military intelligence, Gen. Aharon Ze'evi Farkash, told reporters recently he does not expect an Iraqi attack at the beginning of an American campaign to depose Saddam and his Ba'athist regime. But if Saddam feels he is doomed, he will reconsider his tactics, Ze'evi Farkash added.

By all accounts, Iraq still possesses long-range Scuds capable of hitting Israel.

Assuming that an act of Iraqi aggression will originate in western Iraq, Israel reportedly sent special forces there on covert reconnaissance missions last summer. Their objective was to determine whether Saddam can launch missiles, aircraft or unmanned drones from bases in western Iraq.

It is a vitally important issue.

Bowing to U.S. demands, Israel stayed out of the 1991 war to mollify Arab opinion and to keep the coalition intact. In the process, Israel eroded its deterrent posture.

In return, American forces promised to search for Iraq's mobile Scuds. These missions, however, were a fiasco. Not a single mobile Scud was destroyed, and Israel suffered the consequences: widespread property damage and two direct fatalities.

Cognizant of its failure, the United States has assured the Israeli government that one of its highest priorities in a new war will be to prevent an Iraqi attack on Israel. Washington's name in the Arab world, already sullied, would be mud if Israel also attacked Iraq.

Last October, in a White House meeting with Sharon, U.S. President George W. Bush said he fully expects Israel to retaliate in the event of an unprovoked Iraqi attack. But in fact, the Bush administration wants Israel to stay out of hostilities.

Israel will remain on the sidelines if the war is confined to Iraq. But if Israeli citizens are attacked by weapons of mass destruction and the casualties are serious, Israel will respond in kind, Sharon has warned.

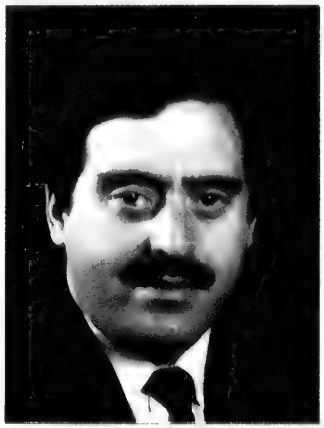
Revitalized mandolin orchestra performs Feb. 9

By ERIC STEIN
Special to The CJN

A mellifluous tremor grows in the distance. At first, it soothes as gently as a trickling mountain stream. Then it grows into a playful clamour, like autumn leaves rustling in a woodland. Soon it climaxes in a powerful crescendo, invoking a gale wind sweeping across a plain. Although these sounds appear organic, they are not produced by the elements. No, this is the sound of a mandolin orchestra, one of the most unique and rarely heard orchestral forms.



Alexander Veprinsky

Toronto is home to one of the world's leading mandolin orchestras. Founded in 1956, the Toronto Mandolin Orchestra is among Canada's oldest community performing groups. It has performed in venues such as Massey Hall, the Ontario Place Forum and the National Arts Centre, in concert tours across Canada, in two separate tours of Ukraine, and they have collaborated with world-class artists and groups.

Now, Toronto audiences will have an opportunity to hear the TMO in concert on Sunday, Feb. 9 at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The performance, called Songs of Love and Passion Through the Ages, will include classical arias and duets, folk and popular songs and orchestral showpieces. Seven vocal soloists will sing in English, French, Italian, Russian and Ukrainian.

Though founded within the Ukrainian-Canadian community, the group's membership has always been ethnically diverse (members are Russian, Jewish, Italian, Hungarian, Yugoslavian, Dutch and English), making it a truly Canadian, multicultural enterprise.

Like the violin-family of instruments, the mandolin comes in a range of different sizes, all of which are featured in the TMO. Entire sections of first and second mandolin, mandola, tenor mandolin, mandocello and mandobass are augmented by a five-piece wind section and percussion, providing a lush musical palette for the interpretation of works that ranges from Slavic and eastern European folk composers to classical, popular and Canadian composers.

Today, the TMO is experiencing a renaissance of sorts. A decade ago, its membership had begun to age and the group's artistic activities needed revitalization. But some recent developments have changed that.

In 1995, Alexander Veprinsky was hired as artistic director. A conservatory-trained professional conductor and arranger from L'viv, Ukraine, Veprinsky broadened the group's repertoire with unique orchestrations of music never before heard in the mandolin orchestra setting, such as Prokofiev's Peter and the Wolf. He also raised the orchestra's level of musicianship, imposing a kind of discipline more often seen in professional symphonies without sacrificing the TMO's friendly family atmosphere.

The TMO has also collaborated with some notable soloists and groups over the last decade, including Tamara Volskaya, a world-renowned virtuoso of the domra (Ukrainian four-string mandolin). Six separate collaborations with Volskaya have yielded two critically acclaimed live CDs, and some of the most memorable musical moments in the TMO's history (the highlight of which has been performances of Veprinsky's show-stopping arrangement of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue for solo domra and mandolin orchestra).

Members of the Toronto Mandolin Orchestra in performance.

Perhaps as a result of these developments, the orchestra has attracted many younger members in the last five years, a number of whom are professional musicians.

Last October, the TMO hosted its 16th annual convention of the Classical Mandolin Society of America (CMSA) in Toronto. The five-day event was attended by 200 delegates from across North America and Europe, and more than 1,000 Toronto concert-goers.

The amazing calibre of the group's performance at the convention prompted Charley Rappaport, a CMSA board member, an expert on American mandolin history and a great mandolinist himself, to remark: "The Toronto Mandolin Orchestra is undoubtedly the premier mandolin orchestra in North America."

High praise indeed, yet the TMO remains a fairly well-kept secret in Toronto. The group is launching a number of new initiatives in an effort to raise its profile. To keep abreast of its activities, visit its Web site at <www.geocities.com/shevchenko1951>, e-mail <infosme@bellnet.ca> or call its office at 416-533-2725. Tickets for the Feb. 9 concert are $20, $18 for seniors/students and $10 for children.

Eric Stein plays mandobass in the Toronto Mandolin Orchestra and is the founder of the Toronto klezmer band Beyond the Pale.

Edmonton artist seeks exposure for her Jewish paintings

By TAMARA STECYK
Special to The CJN

EDMONTON — Helen Muskal embraces themes from the Torah in her painting, and she hopes more Canadian galleries will show her Jewish-inspired work in the future.

"Since I've been painting Judaic work, it's been harder for me to show the Judaic work," the Edmonton artist says.

Muskal explains that it's more difficult because many galleries are not familiar with Judaic themes and may not be able to give the context behind the art.

The Pittsburgh native was inspired to capture her Jewish roots on canvas during her first trip to Israel for a work-study program at age 18.

"Something happened to me when I went to Israel. It just focused my whole life work on painting and Jewish philosophy," she says.

While studying art and working on a kibbutz, she met her future husband, Matt Cohen of Edmonton. They lost touch, but Cohen, who now teaches geology at an Edmonton college, later wrote Muskal a letter after she returned to the United States expressing interest in visiting her.

In 1981, the couple married and Muskal moved to Alberta for a short period before spending four years in Toronto, where she studied at the Art College of Ontario and was influenced by abstract painter Gershon Iskowitz, who took her under his wing.

When Muskal and Cohen moved to Edmonton, Muskal staged her first solo exhibition at Strathcona Place in 1987. Since then, her paintings have been featured in a variety of group and solo shows in Edmonton and Pittsburgh.

But it took a chance meeting between Cohen and another Jewish professor from California at a conference in Banff to set up her most recent exhibition of paintings at Beth Jacob Congregation in Irvine, Calif., last November.

The professor's wife had organized art shows and was willing to put together an exhibit for Muskal at the shul.

"By that meeting, I thought it was meant to be," Muskal says.

At the synagogue, Muskal showed watercolours, mixed media paintings of Judaica, landscapes of southern Alberta and still lifes.

She says her exhibit was well-received and she was able to sell a number of works. The exhibit also boosted her confidence, she says, because she was feeling marginalized as an artist by living in Edmonton.

Muskal has decided to take the next year off from her job as a substitute art teacher with the Edmonton Public School Board and to work in her two studios, building on the themes of Ruth and Naomi in the Bible.

She uses her personal experience as a bridge to unite biblical themes with contemporary Jewish experiences and says Ruth and Naomi show how women can connect and relate to each other today.

Muskal studies Torah every week with a women's group at Edmonton's Orthodox Beth Israel Congregation. "I make the connection between what I'm reading at the time and try to weave together themes," she says.

She says she is also inspired by the Alberta landscape and spends time walking in Edmonton's ravines to find more ideas for her paintings.

Muskal hopes to have her work represented by a Toronto or Montreal gallery, to give her more financial stability as an artist. The Chemers Gallery in Tustin, Calif., and an Internet-based gallery, Galerie Woltjen in Edmonton; currently represent her.[email mscohen@shaw.ca]

In the meantime, she is working on commissioned pieces and is busy raising her two children.

"I've been blessed to have a productive and well-received career," Muskal says.

Documentary chronicles plight of child Buchenwald survivors

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

When American troops liberated Buchenwald in the spring of 1945, they were shocked to see children still alive among the concentration camp's prisoners.

Few children survived the camps during the Holocaust. But those that did had to start a new life without family and little hope.

The documentary The Boys of Buchenwald, airing on History Television, Feb. 6 at 9 p.m. ET/PT, focuses on a group of boys liberated from the camp and sent for rehabilitation to a group home in Normandy run by Organisation Secours les Enfants (OSE). Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel was one of these boys.

Many of them built a bond that lasts until today. Others lost touch until they held their first reunion in Israel in 1988.

For the boys, this was the start of a new life.

"We realized we couldn't go home," one of them says in an interview for the film. "We had to begin a new life, and this was the beginning of that journey."

Without family, the boys were forced to bond with each other. "It was a fraternity based on need," Wiesel says.

Obviously they carried a lot of baggage. Fist fights and fire-starting were common. Judith Hemmendinger, one of the staff who worked with the boys says, "They looked to me completely wild."

Teachers were brought in to educate the boys, many of whom were very young when they were taken into the camp. But at first, the children were very unmanageable.

"I felt sorry for the educators," Wiesel says. "What could they tell us? We knew more than them."

Eventually the boys were split into smaller groups and sent to smaller homes, where, over time, rivalries and violence began to subside and they settled into adolescence. Some even developed schoolboy crushes on staff members and neighbourhood girls.

After two years in the care of OSE, the older boys were left to themselves to find a trade and move on. Many emigrated to Australia, Canada and the United States.

The documentary combines archival film, interviews and footage of some of the boys, now older men, returning to the OSE homes in France 57 years after their liberation.

"We started together and we want to finish together," one of them says.

Business Profile

Andras Hamori is one of Canada's best movie producers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The spotlight seldom shines on Andras Hamori, but he is accustomed to relative anonymity.

Hamori is a movie producer, one of the best in the business, yet he lives in the shadow of actors and directors.

He probably could not care less. His films, ranging from Sunshine to The Sweet Hereafter, have been nominated for two Academy Awards and three Golden Globes, and they have won a succession of prizes at international film festivals.

> Worked with Atom Egoyan and David Cronenberg

Something of a jetsetter who divides his time between London, Los Angeles and Toronto, Hamori, 49, has worked with some of the world's finest directors, from Hungary's Istvan Szabo to Canada's Atom Egoyan and David Cronenberg.

Last month, Hamori's newest production, Max, starring John Cusack and Noah Taylor, debuted in Toronto after opening in New York City. Directed by Menno Meyjes, it turns on the imaginary relationship between two World War I veterans – Jewish art dealer Max Rothman and aspiring Austrian artist Adolf Hitler. Describing Max as a smart and audacious film, Hamori said, "I'm very proud of it."

Max, he explained in a recent interview in a Toronto cafe, basically deals with two overlapping themes: the nature of evil and the phenomenon of anti-Semitism, which he calls "this vulgar, infantile reaction of the masses to problems of society."

As 2003 gets under way, Hamori, founder and president of H2O Motion Pictures, is as busy as ever. In development are three films – the first a love story about a celebrated Spanish bullfighter, the second a political drama concerning the dissolution of an American family and the third a dark comedy from the author of The Singing Detective.

By any measure, Hamori's achievements are quite impressive. But they are all the more remarkable considering the fact that he arrived in Canada only two decades ago, without a single word of English in his vocabulary.

The son of Hungarian Jews who barely survived the Holocaust, he was born and raised in Budapest, the only child of Sandor and Eugenia Hamori, both of whom still live in Hungary.

Hamori's father, whose original surname was Heller, converted to Christianity in the winter of 1943-44, desperately hoping to avoid persecution. But his conversion of convenience was in vain. He was banished to a forced labour camp, and although he escaped, he led a precarious existence for the rest of the war, hiding in a silk factory.

Hamori's mother had a close brush with death as well. When she was 18, she was taken to a collection camp at a brick factory.Twenty-four hours before she was due to be transported to Auschwitz, her mother, in a stroke of inspired guile, saved her from a certain death. She told a young Hungarian guard that Eugenia was a virgin and that she would not be safe in the camp overnight.

The guard allowed her to leave, on the understanding that Eugenia would be brought back the following morning. But that day, mother and daughter locked themselves up in a neighbour's apartment, never to return to the brickyard. Toward the close of the war, Eugenia was almost shot by a member of the Arrow Cross, the local fascist militia.

In postwar Hungary, the Hamoris lacked little, being members of the ruling Communist party. Sandor was an economist and civil servant, while Eugenia was a textile factory manager. "We had a privileged life – an apartment, a car and a cottage," Hamori said.

His interest in cinema began when he was a child. " I went to this daycare where Russian movies were shown every day. I grew up on The Battleship Potemkin, on epic Russian war films."

At university, Hamori studied law. On the side, he finished a diploma in film and theatre journalism. He wrote for a variety of publications and worked for Hungarian state television, but his burning ambition was to be a movie producer. He fulfilled that goal after meeting John Hirsch – a fellow Hungarian Jew living in Toronto – in Budapest.

Hirsch, then head of CBC-TV drama, convinced Hamori to settle in Canada. Then he sponsored him as a new immigrant.

Andras Hamori

Recalling Hirsch, who died in the late 1980s, Hamori said, "He was my mentor. He was one of the smartest men I have known. What I didn't get from my parents, I got from John. He had time for me."

Hamori was glad to leave Budapest. "Hungary was too small for me."

Hungary, too, was not all that hospitable to Jews. "Hungary is a deeply anti-Semitic country," observed Hamori, who, nevertheless, is attached to its sophisticated culture. "You feel it. It's in the air."

Hungary, he added, has yet to come to terms with its role in the Holocaust. "Ordinary Hungarians, from waiters to barbers, helped take away Jews, and they blamed it on the Germans. I could never, never live in Hungary anymore."

> 'Hungary was too small for me'

After settling in Canada in 1981, Hamori, a bachelor, got his second big break. "I was lucky. By a total coincidence, I met [film producer] Robert Lantos. He called me, saying he was starting four movies and wanted me as his assistant. Hungarian Jews have this thing for each other. I needed a job and he needed an assistant."

Under Lantos' guiding hand at Alliance Entertainment, Hamori produced Night Heat, the popular television series carried by the CBS and CTV networks. "I learned the business on Night Heat. I learned everything there."

At Alliance, Hamori also produced Never Talk to Strangers, a thriller with Rebecca De Mornay and Antonio Banderas, and The Gate, a fantasy adventure that garnered the Golden Reel Award for the highest grossing Canadian picture of 1987.

Two years later, Hamori struck out on his own, forming Accent Entertainment Corporation, based in Los Angeles. There he produced a series of television films, Mrs. 'Arris Goes to Paris and Sweating Bullets among them.

In 1993, he co-produced Mesmer, which won an award at the Montreal Film Festival. Hamori returned to Alliance in 1995 to run its feature film arm. It was a productive period for him. He produced Cronenberg's Crash, which captured the Prix Spécial du Jury at the 1996 Cannes Film Festival, and he served as executive producer of Egoyan's The Sweet Hereafter, which was nominated for two Oscars.

One of his greatest triumphs was Sunshine, the story of an upwardly mobile Jewish family in 19th and 20th century Hungary. It was one of the top grossing films in 2000.

Hamori started H2O Motion Pictures 2½ years ago, and since then, in addition to Max, he has produced three films: The 51st State, starring Samuel Jackson; Morvern Callar, starring Samantha Morton, and Owning Mahowny, starring Philip Seymour Hoffman.

If his newest ventures strike a chord with audiences, Hamori will maintain his status as one of Canada's most successful producers, even if most Canadians have never heard of him.

HILLEL ON THE ROOF based on the Gemara

About 2,000 years ago lived a man named Hillel. He loved to learn Torah in the communal beit midrash (house of study) of some of the greatest rabbis of the generation. However, there was a fee of one silver dinar to get in.

Hillel was a woodchopper, and he barely earned enough money to purchase food for himself, let alone pay to enter the beit midrash.

One stormy winter day, no one bought any wood. Snow was falling so heavily that few people even ventured out of their homes.

After spending futile hours on the street with his bundles of wood, Hillel trudged off to the beit midrash. As he approached it, he heard the words of the Torah scholars emerging from within, as they learned and spun brilliant Torah insights.

Hillel's spirits were lifted by their holy words. He ran up the snow-covered gravel walkway and up to the door. As he crossed the threshold, a pair of hands grabbed him.

"Hey, where d'ya think yer goin'?" asked the toll-taker. "Ya don't think yer gettin' in fer free, do ya?"

"I...I don't have any money...please, please let me in," entreated Hillel.

"Uh-uh!" said the bouncer casually. "He paid, he paid, he paid... Why do ya think yer diff'rent? If we start letting you in fer free, we'll start havin' to let ever'one in fer free!"

Disheartened, Hillel slowly wandered away. He wanted desperately to join the scholars inside, but what could he do? Hillel turned around, and gave the beit midrash a parting glance. And then he stopped. There was a skylight on the roof! He ran up to the side wall, and realized that with effort he could scale it. Ten minutes later, a nearly frozen Hillel was on the roof. He numbly crawled to the skylight, and put his ear to the glass. He could hear the learning going on inside!

Hillel stayed there, listening and listening, unaware that night was falling, unaware that he was being covered by a thick blanket of snow, unaware that his ear was almost frozen to the window. And down below, long into the night, the rabbis learned by candlelight, unaware that on the skylight a young man was freezing to death.

Finally the rabbis extinguished their candles and went to sleep in the beit midrash. And up above them, Hillel, who had been straining to hear their words, fell into a deep slumber.

The next morning, the rabbis awoke from their rest, washed their hands, and returned, invigorated, to their studies.

"It's dark today," remarked one of the rabbis as they opened their sforim (books).

"Well, that is to be expected; the skylight's covered with snow," said another.

"I guess you're right," agreed the first one, as his gaze travelled upward to the skylight... "Hey, there's something up there!"

"What... you're right! It looks like... a person!"

A ladder was quickly brought out of the storage room, and the two of them raced to the roof. There was Hillel, covered with a thick layer of snow, and almost frozen with frostbite. They carried him down the ladder and placed him in front of the fireplace.

Hillel's eyelids began to flutter, and then he opened his eyes completely. "What... where am... what's going..." he mumbled.

"Don't worry, just rest for now," said the rabbis.

Later on, after Hillel had thawed out, the full story came out. The rosh yeshiva (head rabbi) said to him, "I can see that Torah is very important to you. The rule that one entering the beit midrash must pay was not written for you. From now on, you may come in and learn whenever you wish."

And Hillel did! In fact, he became a great scholar himself, and his opinion is often cited in the mishnah as the opinion of Beit Hillel (House of Hillel)!

Young researcher puts focus on spinal cord repair

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Molly Shoichet, an associate professor of chemical engineering and applied chemistry at the University of Toronto heads a team of 15 researchers who are testing methods of repairing spinal cord injuries.

The researchers are working on a high-tech polymer tube that wraps around living tissue and promotes regeneration of the spinal cord.

'We are nowhere near human trials, but I believe we are moving in the right direction'

Recently, Shoichet, 37, won the first-ever Young Explorers competition held by the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research (CIAR). In celebration of their 20th anniversary, CIAR presented 20 awards.

The award recognizes young Canadian researchers, 40 and under, who have made a significant contribution in their fields.

Shoichet holds a Canada Research Chair in tissue engineering, combining the disciplines of chemistry, biology and engineering in trying to repair the complex structure of the spinal cord.

The synthetic flexible tubes contain protein fragments. They slide over the damaged portion of the spinal cord and the protein is released, promoting nerve tissue regeneration. This gives the new tissue something to adhere to as it repairs the damaged area.

At this time, the research is being tried on rats. Shoichet says that in a common test of paralysis, the results seen in rats treated with polymer tubes have been optimistic. But she cautions that "we have just taken the first baby steps. We are nowhere near human trials, but I believe we are moving in the right direction."

Their cross-disciplinary research could improve the lives of approximately 30,000 Canadians with spinal cord injuries, she adds.

Shoichet has presented her findings to more than 75 international conferences and has published more than 60 academic articles.

She founded two companies, matRegen and BonTec, and says she hopes to seek out private sector partners to help develop her research commercially.

Shoichet attended the Toronto French School, and in the early 1980s, she entered the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, planning to become a medical doctor.

That all changed, she says, in an undergraduate chemistry lab. "My lab partner convinced me to close my eyes and stir a certain polymer. The fluid polymer became almost impossible to move. It was fascinating and I was hooked."

She received a PhD in chemical engineering at the University of Massachusetts and went to work in private industry.

In 1995, she accepted a teaching and research position at U of T and began her research on spinal cord repair with a multifaceted approach.

Molly Shoichet

The scientist comes by her drive and creativity honestly. Her parents, philanthropists and community leaders Dorothy and Irving Shoichet, set a pattern for success. In a home where she learned to reach out for what seems out of reach, she developed the skills to handle many tasks, and despite her modesty, she has excelled in them all.

With a growing international reputation in the scientific world and while raising two sons, Emerson, 4, and Sabastian, 2, she even finds time to work out.

"I have always done what I am good at and I saw that there was an opportunity to make a difference. I felt I could make a contribution to biomedical engineering by combining my knowledge of materials with my interest in medicine."

Spadina furrier retires at 89

By HEATHER CHEIFETZ SHERMAN
Special to The CJN

Irving Strasberg says he isn't really the sentimental sort.

But Strasberg, 89, one of the last remaining Jewish furriers on Spadina Avenue, says it felt strange to retire last fall after nearly 75 years on the job.

He said it was stranger still to pack up his small office in the historic Balfour Building for the last time.

"I was making money, making a living, so I always thought, 'Why should I quit?'" says Strasberg. "But then the neighbourhood changed, the industry. It just didn't make sense to stay."

Strasberg's grandsons Michael Noble and Jamie Ruben helped him move out his belongings and equipment.

Noble refers to the move as "the end of an era."

He says, "I think it wasn't just a question of money, or of personal joy and pride in his work. It was something he was good at – the making, the selling, the shmoozing. My zaide really did it all."

Irving Strasberg

The youngest of five children, Strasberg was born in 1913 in a small village in prewar Austria (later Poland). After emigrating to Canada in 1928, the family settled first in Winnipeg, where Strasberg, then 15, was placed in a kindergarten class with four- and five-year-olds so he would learn English.

At first, he said, "I couldn't understand a word they were saying. But it worked."

Strasberg began his unanticipated vocation as a furrier with a starting salary of $5 for four weeks of work with a local manufacturer. Singled out by a boss who admired his work, Strasberg realized quickly he had found his calling.

In 1930, his family moved to Toronto, where Strasberg found work at Spadina & Adelaide Furriers, as a "blocker," which involved wetting the furs and stretching them to a certain size. There he made $14 a week – a small fortune at the time – and, like many new Jewish immigrants, dreamed of striking out on his own.

A few years later, Irving and his brother Sam did just that, starting I & S Furs out of a small room in their home on Lippincott Street. By 1936, business had improved and the brothers took on another partner, changed the company name to Arctic Furs and re-opened on Spadina, where Irving quickly took charge, proving he had a knack for business as well.

"I did everything," he says. "I did the cutting, the stitching, the selling, went on buying trips to New York. I knew each customer by name."

He recalls a time when customers were loyal and deals were closed on a handshake.

Meanwhile, Spadina Avenue was evolving, as was Toronto's Jewish community.

"Between 1901 and 1931, Toronto's Jewish population jumped from 3,000 to 45,000," writes Rick Salutin in the forward to his book Spadina Avenue.

The majority of new Jewish immigrants clustered together, living and working on Spadina and its surrounding neighbourhoods, building a community that would eventually migrate north.

At the time, business was booming for the Strasberg brothers. They soon began selling fur trimmings for coats to department store giants Eatons and Simpsons on consignment. Building on its initial success, trimmings became the core of Strasberg's business for the next six decades.

By the end of the 1930s, the Eatons chain was the biggest customer of the area's flourishing garment industry, despite years of labour strife, mostly led by Jewish immigrants. As a self-employed businessman, Strasberg never belonged to a union.

In 1940, Strasberg met Anne Burstein. They courted for nearly a year before getting married in a small ceremony in Toronto.

But just one week after the wedding, the Japanese launched a surprise attack on Pearl Harbor, prompting the United States to join the war effort in support of the British.

In 1943, Strasberg was drafted into the Canadian army and sent to a base in Sydney, Nova Scotia, where he operated heavy machinery and made 50-pound bullets. A year later, he sent for his wife, who gave birth to twin girls, Susan and Rhona, nine months later. After they came back to Toronto, they had a third daughter, Debbie.

In order to get by while Strasberg completed his military service, his brother Sam had taken another partner to keep the business afloat. When he came home, Strasberg decided to go back into business for himself and reacquainted himself with his old customers.

Business had picked up significantly during World War II, with orders for military uniforms and other accessories. But by the mid-to-late 1950s, the industrial – and Jewish – era on Spadina was coming to an end.

"In 1955, Jewish-owned businesses and factories still operated, but with less Jewish workers in them," writes Salutin, adding that imports had "cut heavily into the Canadian market."

Strasberg started up a number of new ventures during those years, including a magazine store at Yonge Street and Sheppard Avenue. That experience ended abruptly a short time later, when police officers caught a group of thieves with a book of matches from Strasberg's shop who were wanted for robbing a nearby store.

"We lost our shirt," he remembers. "Once the customers knew they had been in our store, that was it. They were scared. They never came back."

After sinking most of their savings into the business, Strasberg and his family were forced to sell their home and start from scratch. So he went back to what he knew best – furs.

It took a while to build back the momentum, but by 1960, Strasberg's new company, Willow Furs, was doing so well that he bought a new car – a Pontiac – and made Anne a fur coat. The couple also joined Maple Downs Golf Club that year (where they remain members) and took their first vacation to Miami.

Making the decision to retire wasn't easy, Strasberg says. Attitudes and styles have changed over the years, aging customers have died and the neighbourhood demographic has shifted significantly (the fur business has largely been taken over by Greek, Italian and Portugese furriers, and the neighbourhood has seen a significant increase in Chinese-owned businesses). Although Spadina has retained much of the once-bustling garment industry, new businesses have caused rents to increase astronomically, making small operations like Strasberg's unaffordable.

When Strasberg received a notice from his landlord early last year, saying that his rent had more than doubled, he decided he'd had enough.

Retirement-bound and having recently celebrated his 61st wedding anniversary, Strasberg said he and Anne consider themselves very lucky and plan to make the most of their retirement, spending time with friends and family, including their eight grandchildren, and going on daily walks to the local coffee shop near the apartment they have lived in for more than 30 years. They also look forward to re-uniting with family (many of whom now live in Israel) this summer at their grandchild's wedding in August.

"I have lived a good life," Strasberg smiles. "And now, it's time to live a little more."

Israeli national junior hockey team visits Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Eden Nemenoff has made an important life-altering decision, but he hasn't told his mom yet.

Nemenoff, the diminutive 12-year-old backup goalie for the touring Israeli junior hockey team, wants to return to Canada to pursue his dream of playing goal in a competitive hockey environment.

He knows that in Israel, games are few and far between, while in Canada, it's hockey, hockey, hockey all year round.

With his wool toque festooned with a Maple Leaf logo, he looks like the quintessential Canadian hockey rink rat, but his passport says he hails from a small moshav on the Golan Heights. His home rink is a two-hour drive away in the Canada Centre in Metulla, which houses the only international-size hockey surface in the Middle East.

The lack of a hockey infrastructure makes improving one's skills an iffy proposition at best, and there's just not enough hockey at home to satisfy his cravings. Nemenoff says he'd be willing to move to Canada to play in a local league and improve his skills.

Perhaps there's hope for this Patrick Roy wannabe, who is quick and who loves to be the focus of the team's attention.

Nemenoff was one of 15 Israeli youngsters who recently wrapped up a week-long, two-city tour of Canada that saw them play five exhibition games against mostly Jewish teams in Toronto and Montreal.

While in Montreal, they also enjoyed some on-ice instruction from former Montreal Canadiens head coach Jacques Demers and other Habs alumni. (Demers also coached Canada's hockey team at the 1997 Maccabiah Games to a gold medal.)

Although they only managed a 1-4 record, the Israeli boys said they learned a lot, and the games helped them prepare for the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Division 3 tournament next week in Sarajevo, the capital of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

The Israelis will face off against teams from Iceland, Turkey and Bosnia, with the winner advancing to the larger Division 2 next year.

The Israelis will be boosted by the addition of four Canadians who qualify to play for Israel.

Ron Gal, a goalie with Richmond Hill Stars AA, Michael Lubinsky, a right winger with Toronto Avalanche Midget A, Ziv Zukier, a left winger with Vaughan Panthers Midget A and Aaron Zimner, a centre with Toronto Penguins Midget AA, will join the team in Sarajevo for the tournament. A fifth ringer, defenceman Eden Friedman, will join the team from New York City.

Team coach Eddie Revniaga, an oleh from Riga, Latvia, who played junior hockey with NHLers Sergei Zholtok and Sandis Ozolinsh, believes his boys are good enough to move on to Division 2.

Sergei Matin, president of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel, said the Canadian trip was "very good preparation" for the team.

The visit served as a mini training camp, giving the team the opportunity to play together and practise in advance of the Sarajevo tournament, Matin said. It also helped solidify the bonds between Canadian Jews and Israelis, with hockey as the binding agent, said Moshe Eizenman, one of several tour organizers.

In Montreal, 1,000 people turned out to watch the Israelis tangle with local favourites from Bialik High School in a game Bialik won 9-2.

In Toronto, about 300 spectators watched the Israelis beat the Vaughan Selects 5-3 while another 300 saw the Forest Hill Selects beat the Israelis 6-4. The Avenue Road Selects beat the Israelis 6-3 and in their last tune-up, the CHAT Tigers beat the Israelis 5-2 at RINX.

During their stay in Toronto, the Israelis were billeted with 14 families and, Eizenman said, there was a bigger supply of billets than there were players.

"I felt I did not bring enough children," joked Matin.

A variety of volunteer supporters underwrote the costs in Canada of the trip, including ice time, food, travel and recreational activities. Canadian organizers also pledged to raise $25,000 to support the development of hockey in Israel, Eizenman said.

Israelis will also be returning home with new equipment – something invaluable in a country that doesn't have any sporting good stores that sell hockey gear.

Equipment in Israel is in such short supply that during one game, an Israeli player took a penalty for holding onto a broken stick because he didn't want to let it go in case he lost it, said Jeff Budd, the Canadian-based manager of the team.

Despite its difficulties, Matin believes this version of the Israeli national junior team is better than any he's seen since the inception of the Israeli junior program in 1995. In Sarajevo, the team will add 17-year-old Roman Laren, who played at the top junior level in Khabarovsk, Russia, he said.

Revniaga, who grew up in a hockey culture in Latvia, acknowledges that the Israeli-born players seem to lack the emotional connection to the game that Canadians and Russians have.

"A problem for our guys is that they can't feel it. They don't know that style of life that is hockey. The atmosphere in Israel is not a hockey atmosphere. They don't respond in the same emotional way."

On the ice, however, the Israeli juniors seemed to enjoy their immersion in Canada's hockey culture.

Nemenoff, for one, is one of three hockey-playing brothers, a sort of Israeli version of the Hunter or Sutter brothers.

His oldest brother, Matan, travelled to Canada one summer to attend Roger Neilson's hockey school, but his hockey development was cut short by military service. Instead of fighting for the puck, he's now fighting the Palestinians, piloting a Cobra helicopter gunship.

The middle brother, Shalev, will join the Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) in a few weeks, while Eden Hof, another 18-year-old member of the junior team, will not get to play in Sarajevo. He was due to report to the IDF four days after returning from Canada.

Raviv Bull, the team's 15-year-old captain, hails from Kibbutz Shamir in Israel's north. He's been playing hockey for a few years now and said learning to skate was the hardest skill to acquire. Now that he has the hang of it, he said he loves to play his centre ice position.

"You're up on attack, down on defence. You've got to be everywhere at once," Bull said.

A fan of Steve Yzerman, Bull acknowledged the team was a bit down in the dumps after losing to Canadian select teams. "We know it won't be easy at the [IIHF] championship," he said.

The Canadian experience was beneficial, he continued, especially since the team was trained by Europeans. Now the boys know "the hits come more often. We're getting used to it and hitting back."

Oren Zamir, a 14-year-old native of Metulla, has been playing hockey for six years. He started out with skating lessons and was convinced to give the sport a try by assistant coach Boris Mindel.

A left-winger, he loves "the combination of power, speed, strategy. I really like it. I really like the nice passes and good plays."

Ra'anan Moscovich, from moshav Kidmat Zvi in the Golan Heights, had skated for a few years before a friend told him he should try hockey. Moscovich, 16, gave it a go and enjoyed it. He's been playing for only two years."I like the roughness and you have to do everything fast," he said.

Defenceman Tal Popkov was born in Vitebsk in the former Soviet Union, but moved with his family to Israel at age five. Now a resident of Kiryat Shmona, Popkov, 17, started out practising short track speed skating in the Canada Centre. The hockey team had the ice after his practice and he stuck around to watch them play.

"I just fell in love with the game and I started to play. I love the speed, the excitement, the teamwork," said Popkov, who attended one session of Roger Neilson's hockey camp in Metulla.

Nemenoff is also a confirmed hockey addict. As a goalie, he said "I always like to save the team. It's all in your hands. Seventy per cent of the game depends on you. I like it.

"I think I will go to Canada to live and return for the hockey."

Nice idea, but let's wait to hear what his parents have to say.

• The Enemy Within, by Rabbi Abraham J. Twerski, M.D., Mesorah Publications, $33.99, SC.

In this book, the renowned Dr. Twerski discusses a wide range of modern ills and, using his insights from the Torah and human psychology, makes us feel we can overcome them.

• The Rescue of Jerusalem, by Henry T. Aubin, Doubleday, $22.95, SC.

A unique theory about the alliance of the Hebrews and the Africans in 700 BC and its impact on the future.

• Militant Islam Reaches America, by Daniel Pipes, W.W. Norton, $37.99, HC.

This fascinating (and frightening) book discusses the profound difference, according to the author, between Islam the religion and militant Islam. Pipes, a brilliant, respected political thinker, believes that the latter, which he also terms Islamism, is the greatest threat to western civilization and to security and freedom since the Cold War.

• "If There's Anything I Can Do..." by Rebecca Bram Feldbaum, Feldheim Publishers, $38.99, HC.

This remarkable memoir of personal loss – beautifully written with warmth, honesty and even a touch of humour – offers advice and strength to those experiencing tragedy and emotional trauma. It also serves as a wonderful guide for helping others, including the dos and don'ts for supporting those experiencing difficult times.

YOUTH

Ages 8-12

• Margit, by Kathy Kacer, Penguin Books, $7.99, SC.

The latest novel by the award-winning author (The Secret of Gabi's Dresser, Clara's War) is part of the Our Canadian Girl series and focuses on Jewish immigration to Canada in the 20th century. (The author will read from her work at Beth Avraham Yoseph, 613 Clark Ave., Thornhill, on Sunday, Feb. 9, 3 p.m.)

Ages 6 and up

• Jewish Holidays All Year Round, by Ilene Cooper, Harry N. Abrams, $29.95, HC.

This visually attractive gift book, illustrated by Elivia Savadier, clearly explains the history, meaning and relevance of these special occasions. Written in association with the Jewish Museum in New York City, it includes artwork and artifacts from the museum as well as crafts and recipes. Useful for adults interested in gaining a basic understanding of the holidays, and appropriate for all denominations.

Ages 3-6

• There's Room In My House, by Malky Weinstock, Ohr-Light Press, $27.99, HC.

An adorable book about the mitzvah of hospitality. Colourfully illustrated by Melanie Schmidt.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I'm in my last year of high school and I'm feeling extremely stressed out. All of a sudden this year, I have more tests and assignments, and there is a much bigger buildup to the mid-year exam period. The work is also harder. I feel as though the teachers have been going easy on us students up until now and are suddenly changing completely. The load is very difficult to handle because I need to do better this year than I have in the past. I am a nervous wreck! Help!

Wreck

Dear Wreck,

First of all, sit back and take a deep breath. The very fact that you are so concerned with your schoolwork probably means you are doing better than you think. And I know you have probably heard this before, but your teachers are probably trying to prepare you for next year. Still, I can see where you're coming from.

The best advice I can give is to stay organized. Set aside half-an-hour as soon as you can and organize your binders and papers, making sure everything is in its place. Go through your planner and write in every test, assignment and quiz you have. If you're not sure when something is due, ask someone in your class (Teachers get annoyed when you ask them something you're already supposed to know.) Plan out your evenings and weekends to do what is due soonest first. I'm sure you have been told this before, but if you stick to it, you will feel much more confident about your grades and your academic abilities in general.

Despite what I said before, do not hesitate to ask teachers specific questions about lessons and assignments – that's what they're there for! And study with people you work well with. You will stay focused if you are with other people who are focused rather than if you study by yourself. Also, talk to someone about your concerns – your parents, friends or a teacher you like. You'll find they have gone through, or are currently going through, exactly the same thing.

Best of luck!

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.
